North Highway To Lake Opens

CRATER LAKE NATIONAL PARK, July 23—The north entrance highway to Crater Lake national park opened officially to the public at 7 a. m. today. One of the heaviest snow packs in the history of the park impeded snow removal operations on this approach road and has advanced the opening date much later than normal.

In addition to providing an all-paved approach to Crater lake from U. S. highway 97 and from the Diamond lake cut-off the north entrance makes available six miles of the rim drive with its many and different views of the lake and affords access to the Watchman lookout atop the most prominent peak on the west rim from which sweeping views of Crater lake, the adjacent country and expanses of the Cascades can be had, to Discovery point, the Devil's backbone, the most outstanding dike formation in the walls of the crater, and to the glacial scratches in this same vicinity.

It is suggested that motorists use the north entrance to Crater lake rather than the east entrance since the former road is paved all the way, less steep and affords more and better views of the lake. The north entrance reduces materially the distance and driving time between Diamond lake and points in the Klamath basin.
