Timber Men Eye Auction Sale Plan

Sale of timber on an auction basis is under serious consideration by officials of the national forest service, according to John Sarginson, district ranger of the Rogue river national forest with headquarters here.

Sarginson pointed out that the long-established bid procedure of the forest service is to take sealed offers on lots of timber. He said the proposal to change to auction plan on certain sales is the result of recent wild bidding and a desire to avoid disturbing the stability of wood-using plants and existing communities long dependent upon national forest timber supplies.

The ranger quoted Regional Forester Horace Andrews to the effect that auction bidding will be undertaken only in certain cases where the public interest seems to demand it. It was pointed out that bidders, faced with a life-and-death situation with respect to a certain lot of timber, may make excessive bids on a blind basis.

If the bidding is by auction, they will at least know how high they must bid to get the timber. Sarginson said that although auction procedure has been authorized for some time, it has not so far been used in this region.

Wounded Vets Get Last Call

The United States army is bringing to an end this month the opportunity for combat wounded men to reenlist, it was announced this week by Lt. B. J. Tucker, army recruiting service.

March 31 has been set as the deadline after which no further applications will be considered and all those eligible are urged to get in touch with their local recruiting station immediately, Lt. Tucker said.

Under the plan which is now being terminated, hundreds of army jobs falling into 103 different categories, were thrown open for enlistment to partially disabled veterans of World War II who were wounded in combat.

Of the 103 MOS covered by the plan, only 23 require qualified experience. Although experience is desirable in the other 80 MOS, it is not essential since those who meet the revised physical requirements will be given the training necessary to make them efficient in the job to which they are assigned.
