

Dismantling Of Wartime Aircraft Detection Unit Leaves US Open To Attack

WASHINGTON, April 14 (AP)—The United States—its wartime aircraft detection network all but dismantled—is virtually wide open to a surprise attack from the air.

An unofficial survey indicated this today, following the disclosure last week of a document dealing with war department thinking on the national security effects of the atomic bomb.

That document, prepared primarily for congressional use, commented that present-day methods of delivering an atomic attack are limited to long-range bombers or bombs smuggled in by agents. Rocket delivery is something to be reckoned with in the future, the paper said.

Questioned by a reporter concerning the aerial assault theory, officers assigned to the development and employment of defense weapons emphasized that the greatest problem would be the detection of any attacking force in time to get fighter aircraft and anti-aircraft guns into action.

During the war the sea coasts, borders and interior of the country were covered by a tie-in radar network which detected the approach of aircraft from any direction and plotted its course as it moved inland.

Demobilization reduced army and navy manpower to the point, however, where it no longer became possible to operate this detection complex. While it is presumed that local defense areas still in operation continue to use radar detection equipment, they are not numerous enough nor linked together to form a screen. One officer summed it up this way:

"It would be possible today for a foreign aircraft to approach and fly clear across the United States without ever being reported."

Experts agree that until the advent of guided missiles and improvement in the accuracy of rocket-type weapons, the defense against attack by air must rest, as it did in World War II, primarily on anti-aircraft artillery and fighter airplanes.

AAF Member Given Military Honors

PORTLAND, April 14 (AP)—Military honors were given Col. James L. Travis, 35, Portland army air force member killed in the crash of an army transport, at funeral services here today.

Capt. Jerome Burwell represented the army as military escort, and Oregon national guardsmen participated at the burial. Pallbearers were air force friends of the Portlander.

The widow was accompanied here by her parents, Mr. and

Roundup Slates Top Racers

The racing program at the Red Bluff Roundup on April 19 and 20 will bring together the largest field of fast thoroughbreds ever seen in Northern California, according to Fred C. Pugh, racing director.

Stall reservations for 60 horses have already been received, Pugh stated, and more are expected before show time.

In addition to two flat races each day there will be an exciting quarter horse race and a men's relay race each day. Five relay strings are expected to enter, and Roundup fans will see plenty of excitement in front of the stands as the jockeys change saddles and mounts at the end of each lap.

The racing strip at the Roundup grounds is being brought to perfect condition, and it is predicted that track records in every event will be broken.
