

Astronomers See Far Off Possibility Of World End

By J. HUGH PRUETT

Oregon Higher Education System
The expectancy of the "end of the world" has through the centuries instilled both joy and dread in the minds of mankind. The early Christians seemingly considered it an immediate event. Around A. D. 1100, the widespread belief that the end was right at hand surely influenced the excesses of the Crusades. Many times during the past century, a definite date for this terrestrial catastrophe has been assigned, but the old world still rolls right along through empty space, sustained by mighty universal processes which are absolutely uninfluenced by the errors of human judgment.

Astronomers see the possibility of the earth's destruction at some future time through natural occurrences. But there is no evidence that this is an event of the near future. If it takes place at all, it may be a million or a billion years from now. From a scientific standpoint no time prediction is possible.

Some have thought that all earth-life would be poisoned should we ever pass through a comet's tail. But this has occurred twice during the past century (1861 and 1910) without any noticeable effect. And it is likely that heads of comets have struck the earth with only localized destruction occurring. An asteroid's impact might be somewhat similar.

It is pretty well agreed that the moon after getting farther from the earth for awhile, will in the distant future approach much nearer than now, and because of tidal forces, break up into well-nigh countless pieces which will form a luminous ring around our world, something like the ring around Saturn. But aside from the inconvenience of some of the fragments tumbling to earth, this should cause no general destruction.

Assuming the correctness of the present theory regarding the source of the sun's heat, old Sol will not completely "run out of fuel" for untold ages yet. But if nothing worse occurs meanwhile, it will surely finally go out and leave the solar system without light and heat.

Another source of disaster — one of real destruction would be the approach toward us from the depths of space of a huge sun (all the stars are suns) which would finally plunge through our solar system and perhaps strike our sun. The increasing brightness of such a star during the multitudes of generations it would approach us, would allow scientists ample time for determining when in the distant future it would reach us.

A most terrible cataclysm could result should our sun sometime suddenly flare up as do stars known as novae, which in one day increase in light and heat many thousand fold. That would certainly bring the "end of the world." But there is no evidence that such is apt to occur, so let's not worry.

The peacetime navy offers a better career than ever before, learn while you earn.
