JOE DOE WRITES:
Dear Butch:
Last night when my wife Ida and I had settled down in bed, she says, "Joe, dear, we were talking about the circus that was here last week over at Dora's house today and she said that lion-trainers made those wild lions wild by feeding them raw meat. She said it was the same with husbands. She said every time you saw a husband that was wild and who growled at his wife it was because he ate his beef steaks rare. I told her that couldn't be true because you always ate those nice beef steaks rare that we get at The Palace Market, and that you have the sweetest disposition. And besides, that lion-trainer kept shooting those lions in the face with a revolver all the time. That's enough to make anybody wild. I wish you would ask Butch about this, Joe, because I think Dora is mistaken." "All right, Babe," I says, "I will. Now let's get some rest."

After a minute or two when I was half asleep, Ida whispers, "Joe, dear, will you answer me a question on your word of honor, so help you?" "Uh," I groaned, "Well," she says, "Who was that awful lady at the circus with the blond wig and green garters who pulled you away from me, whispered in your ear, and then threw her arms around you before all those people? I'm sure Dora recognized you for she used that as an example of a wild rare-steak-eating husband and she said it looked enough like you to be your brother." "I told you, Babe," I says, "I don't know that dame, so help me. She was a clown in the show." "I suppose you were a clown in the show, TOO," says Ida. The too part of that remark was accompanied by a swift kick which sprawled me and my pajamas in the middle of the bedroom floor.
