

Elaborate Styles Show, In Paris

PARIS—(AP)—The first of Paris' showings of fall styles indicates that dresses are going to be longer and broader, and that much attention will be paid to the part of a dress you notice as you come along behind a pretty woman going down the street.

The first opening last night was by Jean Dessès, who draped bits of the Orient into his new fashions and brought some rather warm comments from some of the professionals who attend such shows.

Dessès used a lot of black, wool satin and silk jersey. He did much draping that swung the center of gravity down to table-top level and even below. He employed lavishly a trick centuries old in the Orient, of pulling the bottom hem upward and inward like the drawingstring on an inverted purse. This gave his designs a peculiar fullness below the hipline which French couturiers called the "barrel shape."

Except for some of his formal evening gowns there was little variation in length. Dresses and some of the coats reached half-way down the calf of the leg.

As to the diameter of his designs he was absolutely reckless. On one wool dress he put pockets at hip level in front which extended bulgingly downward like the wind vane of a jet plane. It made the waistline look almost as narrow as your wrist.

His main attention was to the back. One little black short-jacketed suit had a dozen pleats down the skirt. Cocktail gowns sometimes bulged out madly in all directions and one evening gown, again ankle length, had a double bustle.

Dessès didn't seem much concerned about preserving the flat stomachs of his models. On several models, including one in coarse wool, he frankly recognized that some women don't have flat stomachs and he built to fit.

The only admission to the dome is a box lunch for two. It will be auctioned off to the highest bidder, the buyer having the pleasure of eating with the woman who prepared the lunch inside the box. All proceeds from the affair will be used for the building of shelters for the bus students of Klamath county.

J. W. Keris company will give the prize to the woman whom the judges select as having prepared the most attractive box. J. C. Rennie of Rennie's jewelry store is furnishing the gift for the oldest lady attending. Lee Hendrick of Hendricks drug will present a gift to the couple winning the prize walk.
