

Jesse Lee Kirk Says US Not Liable For Schools Under Indian Treaty Terms

Jesse Lee Kirk, Klamath Indian who says he believes the Indians should "carry their share" of the expense of educating Indian children in Klamath schools, said today that many Indians do not know that the treaty of 1864 did not provide for an education program to go on indefinitely.

Article 2 of the 1864 treaty set up a schedule of payments by the United States to the Indian tribes, as follows:

$8000 per annum for five years beginning in 1865; $5000 per annum for the next succeeding five-year period; $3000 per annum for the next succeeding five-year period.

The money was ordered spent to the benefit of the Indians—to promote their well-being, to "advance them in civilization" and especially agriculture, and to secure their "moral improvement and education."

Article 4 provided the government would build a manual labor school-house, and furnish books and stationery for the manual labor school for 20 years. Article 5 provided the government would pay for two school teachers for 20 years.

Kirk pointed out that the education program thus provided in the treaty was to extend for only 20 years, or until 1884.

He said that in addition to the manual school building, other buildings were constructed by the government out of gratuity funds, including the Yainax school recently pictured in the historical series running in this paper. Day schools were also established at Modoc Point, Chiloquin, Beatty and Piute camp.

Later, all schools were concentrated at Klamath Agency. After the dormitory buildings there burned down in 1928, the Indian children from then on have attended public schools.

When the Indian tribes received the Yamsay judgment of $7,000,000 in 1938, Kirk said, the government deducted all of the money expended for education and other purposes in behalf of the Indians except that provided in the treaty of 1864.

In other words, Kirk said, the government has not actually accepted responsibility for Indian education since 1884. Some gratuity money is now being used for roads, extension service and education, he said, but past experience indicates the government will require that the Indians pay it back as was done with the money spent before the Yamsay judgment.

Kirk said some Indians have the idea that under the treaty, the government had responsibility for Indian education for all time.

Star Route Delivery Eyed

WASHINGTON, May 10 (AP)—Rep. Stockman (R-Ore.) wants the post office department to provide star route mail service for Oregon ranchers who now must travel about 80 miles to get their mail.

A 10-mile extension of the star route now operating from Riverdale to Creston, so that it would go to the Crowley ranch area, Stockman said, would give 14 ranchers in the Crowley area a weekly delivery.

Now, with the 80-mile trip to be made to Vale, Ore., he said the ranchers can get their mail only once in every four to six weeks.

Stockman said the Crowley section has no telephones or other communication with the rest of the state. The department, he said, once dropped plans for extending the star route to the community because of bad roads but that since that time the ranchers have spent $2000 in improving them.

Stockman said the department has agreed to look into the matter again.
