Umatilla Forest Area To Be Sprayed For Bud-Worm

PENELETON, Ore., May 20 (AP)—Another forest killer is to get a taste of DDT.

Supervisor Carl Ewing announced today that about 5000 acres of Umatilla national forest near Heppner will be sprayed this spring to test the killing power of DDT on spruce budworm.

He said a budworm infestation was threatening about 710,000 acres of Eastern Oregon and Eastern Washington fir forests. Not many trees have died yet but the outbreak has reached a "critical stage," he said.

Spraying with airplanes and helicopters will start about June 15. The experimental area, 6720 acres, will be divided into 15 420-acre plots. Twelve of these will be sprayed and the other three left as checks, Ewing said.

Tussock Moth

Tussock moth virtually was wiped out in 14,000 acres of forest near Troy, Ore., last year by DDT sprayed from planes but its effectiveness against budworm has not been verified fully, he said.

The experiment in the Heppner district will attempt to test the lethal powers of various solutions of DDT.

The budworm, a pale green caterpillar less than half an inch long, eats the needle buds of fir, pine and other trees when they begin to swell in the spring. This stops the tree from "breathing." The tree dies if most of its needles are destroyed.

John B. Woods Jr., assistant state forester, will boss the project. Ewing said. Ground surveys will be made to determine status of the infestation in each plot prior to treatment. A temporary landing field will be built in the area and headquarters will be established June 1 at Tupperguard station.

Ewing said cost of the project would be about $10,000. It should be completed by August 1.

The Barnes have conducted the business since June 23, 1945, and built up an outstanding trade.

Asked if they were to remain in Keno, Fred said, "Yes, that's what we planned to do when we came here and expect to stay unless they run us out." Their future plans are indefinite but they will store their household goods until they can find a house. In the meantime they will stay with Mr. and Mrs. Dick Morgan. Mrs. Morgan, who has been assistant cook in the cafe since it opened, will not remain with the new owner.

The community will miss these fine folks in the cafe and we extend a welcome to the new owner. She will continue to serve about the same menus as usual and in addition will serve breakfast and short orders.
