Blood Knowledge Helps

By EDWIN F. JORDAN, M. D. Written for NEA Service

A tremendous gain in knowledge about the value of whole blood transfusions and of blood preparations like plasma has occurred during and since the war. In accidents, severe hemorrhages, and in several different kinds of diseases, the giving of blood transfusions or of plasma often means the difference between life and death.

Whole blood, when it can be given, is more valuable than plasma or the other portions of the blood because it contains all of the elements required. It cannot be used in all cases, however, as in addition to the time limit on its preservation, it also requires "matching" with blood of the recipient or receiver in order to avoid undesirable reactions. When this matching is not possible then plasma is especially useful as the latter can be given without danger of reaction.

Separate Use Possible Whole blood consists of plasma and red blood cells. When the plasma is prepared for special purposes the red blood cells are available for other use. The cells separated from the plasma may be resuspended or mixed with some other liquid and used for patients who do not have enough plasma. These resuspended red cells are particularly useful in certain kinds of anemia. Plasma is a good emergency substitute for whole blood in the treatment of hemorrhage or severe bleeding; it is the best substance to use to replace the plasma lost from severe burns and provides an already prepared protein for patients with acute illnesses requiring it.

Now plasma can be separated into its component or separate parts. It is possible to give the individual plasma proteins which serve particular purposes in comparative pure form. These parts or fractions of plasma may eventually replace the use of whole plasma. In peacetime and with the aid of "blood banks" whole blood is, however, the greatest life saver of all.

Note: Dr. Jordan is unable to answer individual questions day he will answer one of the most frequently asked questions in his column.

WHY WE SAY "A BARKING DOG WILL NOT BITE"

This expression was derived from the theory that barking is a sign of tameness in a dog for in a wild state a dog will not bark, only howl, whine or growl.
