

HERE'S THE DESIGN OF A GOOD PLACE TO TEACH HOME-MAKING

High Schools Expand Vocational Training

A broader type program is being instituted in Oregon high schools since passage of a law a few years ago requiring all 18-year-olds in the state to either be in school or have a high school diploma.

Formerly, the educational age requirement was 16 years. While more people finish high school under the new set-up, the program had to be broadened to offer training of value to the greatly increased number of students stepping directly from high school into jobs, still keeping the more academic studies available for those who will go on to college.

This trend has resulted in more extensive vocational courses offered in the state's high schools. Technical courses are not designed to turn a student out as a craftsman in his trade, but merely to better equip him for working at that trade and learning the fine points of it later.

Educators endeavor to keep a happy balance between technical and academic courses so that all students are benefited.

Extensive opportunities for extracurricular activities are offered in high school with many clubs, athletics, music groups and others providing a wide field of choice.

THE department of home economics at Klamath Union high school is being enlarged and modernized to create interest in home management and to help make future home owners more efficient. The picture shows the layout of the room.

According to Principal James Brown of KUHS, most of the girls who attend KUHS marry and remain in this area, and have need of knowledge about the home.

The new department will be completely modern. The room will be styled with six unit kitchens built on the most efficient plan. The cabinets will have stainless steel tops. The classes will have 24 members in each, since only four girls can work in each kitchen unit. One large demonstration unit will be built for large class work.

The space has been handled so that for the most part it is multiple purpose. For example, the demonstration area could also be used for child care, furniture upholstering classes, and for small teas and parties.

The teacher's desk is located at a vantage point so that she may observe the entire class procedure.

A dining area has been set up so that the girls may learn how to plan parties and set a table and serve.

In order to arrange the new room, the dining room and wall, which divided the former area, have been removed. Work will be completed on September 15.
