A Teller Of Tall Tales

By FRANK TRIPP

They may tell taller tales some place than around a waterfront, but I never found the place.

Landubber Rodney Skinner decided to go angling, which required that he become boatman too. He bought a boat, and a nice one, but heavy for a fishing craft and clumsy to turn bottom upward on the beach.

Hailing it after rains became a bore some chore to Rodney until he got an idea from listening to those otherwise colossal lars, known as fishermen.

"It's a funny boat, without a drainhole," said Hi Bias. "I wouldn't own such a tub." Hi never owned a boat anyway, always borrowed one.

A drainhole seemed reasonable to Rodney, who went straight to his new boat and bored a one-inch hole in its bottom. It was too late to retreat when it occurred to him that water will flow both ways through a hole.

Hi went back to Hi with his problem.

Hi m. "Which side did you bore from?" asked Hi.

"From the bottom side," replied Rodney.

"That's what's the matter," Hi told him. "You only wanted to let the water out. You should have bored from the inside. Now you've got to make a plug for the hole."

Laboriously Rodney hunted out a plug, and hurried because he wanted to go fishing. It wasn't too good a plug, not round and true. Nevertheless Rodney cast off with a boatload of lunch, thermos bottles and the expensive and largely useless gadgets that newborn anglers fall for.

Well out from shore he began to bail. "Pound the plug in tighter," Hi yelled to him. Rodney did—with his heel. At once the drainhole became a split a foot long in the bottom of his new boat. This loosened the plug entirely and the boat filled with water almost quicker than it takes to tell it.

Floatable things spread over the water. Rodney clung to the swamped boat and called for help. Hi rowed out to him, helped him aboard, gathered up what equipment hadn't sunk and towed in the crippled craft. It was one way Hi garnered chewing tobacco money.

Rodney slipped Hi a five spot but complained: "You should have told me to bore that hole from the inside."

"You didn't ask me," was Hi's professional retort.

Jabes Jerolemon was a gum soul. He had endured more than 60 years of unsatisfactory existence, during which nothing or nobody had convinced him that life was worth living.

So one day he decided to end it all—and to make a good and certain job of it. Being morbidly ingenious, he made elaborate preparations for his departure. Jabes got him a rope, a revolver, a bottle of poison, a can of gasoline, some matches, and on a bleak November morning he hied himself up the lake to a lonely spot.

He sought a tree high on a cliff with a limb extending over deep water. He threw the rope over the limb and secured one end by a slip knot. On the other end he made a hangman's noose about his neck. He

Church Saves Mail Carrier From Prison

SPOKANE, Sept. 7 (AP)—A $250 collection donated by a Post Falls, Ida., church saved a Spokane postal employee from a term in prison yesterday.

Donald William Demetry, 24, a substitute letter carrier, was placed on probation for three years after pleading guilty to a charge of embezzlement from the mails.

Asst. U. S. Atty. Frank Freeman said Demetry had taken three checks from the mails, and cashed them while his wife was in the hospital awaiting birth of a daughter.

The money for restitution was donated by the Post Falls church where Demetry's wife was known by members.

Federal Judge Sam M. Driver also placed another postal employee on probation after assessing a $500 fine. Louis Arthur Larsen, an employee for 33 years, pleaded guilty to taking a letter containing $4.50.

would hang himself as part of his gruesome plan.

To eliminate uncertainties he made use of the other items which would puzzle chroniclers of his demise when finally his body would be found by swimmers next spring. He saturated his clothes with the gasoline; uncorked the bottle of poison and held it between his lips.

In agile movement, which he had carefully planned, he set fire to his trousers, raised his head and emptied the poison into his mouth and with his clothes ablaze and revolver at his temple, he leaped from the cliff and swung by his neck over the water. He pulled the trigger as his last act of self-extinction.

Now, you'd swear that Jabes must be dead—but he isn't. I know that all of these things are true because Jabes told me them himself.

Says I to Jabes: "It couldn't be. You hanged, burned, poisoned and shot yourself, you say, and here you are telling me about it. How come?"

Whereupon Jabes accounted for it all in quite logical fashion.

"Well," said he, "the revolver was a mistake. My hand slipped as I pulled the trigger. The bullet severed the rope. I fell into the lake
