It is remarkable how much trouble a fellow can get into when he feels it his duty to get an athlete who is a little "slow" in ancient history admitted to college. This is the predicament Jeff Sterling, played by Larry Aenis, finds himself in as student football manager, Shirley Kimball, the president's daughter, and co-instructor of the plot and ably portrayed by Jo Ann Conklin, helps complicate matters.

Those who have had a sneak preview maintain that the 12 students responsible for the action which takes place in the living room of the president of Dartford college will keep the audience laughing hilariously for 90 minutes.

How GROUPING mills helps all of us

PROSPEROUS communities are based on profitably operated industries that offer steady employment. In such industries a big share of the money coming in from all over America through the sale of products is used to pay steady wages. Steady incomes make it possible for people to build homes, for merchants to build businesses, and for government (through taxes) to maintain schools, libraries, roads and other public needs.

This company's objective is permanent logging and mill operation. Our system of tree farms is aimed toward providing an endless supply of raw materials. Our program of diversified manufacturing and plant integration (grouping of plants on one mill-site) is aimed toward making more products from less timber by increased utilization.

This is made economically possible by more efficient operation—as a result of savings in material handling, centralized power source and administrative costs. These programs, coupled with development of new products and expansion of stabilized markets, are important steps toward a permanent and profitable forest industry for all of us.
