Building Oregon Together

PROVIDES BOX TOPS; BOTTOMS, TOO. Louis Rupp decided in 1945 that Hood River apple and pear orchards needed a close-at-hand veneer plant to furnish slatted tops and bottoms for fruit boxes. Assistance from First National at Hood River enabled him to start the Hood River Box & Veneer Co. at Odell. The plant is near both the orchards and supplies of pine and fir logs for "peeling." Today it provides 21 Oregon jobs directly. Use of a 64-inch lathe and other modern equipment produces 5,000,000 pliable "lids" annually for boxes with sides and ends of regularly cut lumber.

CHIN-UPPERS SERVE FISHERMEN. Fred and Bernice Camp of Stayton, who met as wheelchair members of the Chin-Up Club, have established a thriving Oregon business, despite their physical handicaps. Eight years ago Fred began tying trout fishing flies. Today the Camps operate the Camp Tackle Co., with Stayton and Portland shops serving America's sports fishermen. The firm, employing more than a dozen persons, catalogs 400 varieties of flies and 25 of spinners. Both Fred, who is Stayton's Chamber of Commerce president, and Bernice are enthusiastic over cooperation they've received from the Stayton Branch of the First National Bank.

MEAT IS THEIR DISH. As an Eastern Oregon livestock marketer, Samuel E. Hill saw the need for a wholesale meat service in Pendleton. Three years ago he purchased a small "custom" slaughterhouse, serving only the individual needs of owners of hogs, cattle and lambs. With the help of his wife and son, Clinton J. Hill (now a New York art student), Hill extended the business by providing fresh and cured meats for nearby markets and restaurants. Now the Hill Meat Co. is in enlarged quarters and provides seven non-family jobs. The firm continues to advance its growth through helpful services of the Pendleton Branch of First National.

The persons you meet here have the kind of vision and initiative on which Oregon's prosperity is based. They have taken widely different means of bettering themselves—but in each case they have increased our state's income, created new jobs and added opportunities for all of us. To help individuals help themselves and, thus, build Oregon—family by family, farm by farm and business by business—banks in the First National Group make their constructive services widely available. Come in and let us know how we can help you.
