

'Old Timers' At State Pen Worry About Outlook For Young Men; Conditions OK

By PAUL W. HARVEY JR. SALEM — The veteran state prison convicts who have 25 years or more of crime and several prisons behind them are worried about the younger generation.

These old-timers say they were the victims of the days following World War I, when money came easy. Wives worked instead of taking care of their children, and many homes were broken up. So many children became delinquents and ended up in prison.

Now the veteran criminals say they can see exactly the same thing happening after World War II. They are sorry to see so many young fellows coming into the prison, and the old-timers wish they could make these boys see what's going to happen to them unless they reverse their criminal habits.

The old-timers feel that unless somebody does something for the young fellows, they will end up where the old-timers are now—in strict segregation, cut off from communication even with other convicts.

This information was learned over the Christmas and New Year holidays by E. W. Jacobus, 29-year-old University of Oregon graduate student in psychology. He and two sociology students from the university—Clyde Fahlman, 20, junior from Eugene, and Bill Barber, 27, graduate student from Salem—spent 10 days working at the prison.

They learned a lot, too, discovering things that can be learned only by somebody not connected with the prison.

"The hardened criminals," says Jacobus, who spent his whole life with the men in segregation, "think the young criminals today will have a better chance because under the new program, the prison officials are interested in helping them, instead of just punishing them."

Jacobus said he found the old-timers very cooperative and friendly.

The three young men worked under John R. Akin, prison sociologist, who was so impressed with their good work that it will become a permanent project during college vacations.

They didn't get any pay, but received their food and lodging in the guard's quarters.

Fahlman and Barber worked with first offenders who had been admitted recently.

Before they came here, none of the three students had any desire to go into prison work. But now they are seriously considering it. They say their experience has made what they read in their textbooks suddenly become alive and real.

All three found that the convicts like the change in the prison from a penal institution to a correctional institution.

The prisoners feel that the state now is interested in helping them get rid of their criminal tendencies, rather than just in getting revenge.

Fahlman said "the prisoners are still a little uneasy and uncertain as to where they stand, but they know the institution is becoming more personalized. They are becoming names instead of numbers."

Barber said "There's a long way to go yet, but the changes the warden has made are a step in the right direction."

Warden Virgil O'Malley says it will take two or three years to get the program well under way.

The men in segregation, Jacobus said, "like the new program because they see it's not built for bitterness. He thinks some of these men might even be reformed."

The convicts liked the idea of being interviewed by the students, because it demonstrated that people on the outside are interested in them. Convicts don't like to be forgotten men.

The three students say that the public has to become better informed about the prison and its program.

Akin hopes to get more students during the spring vacation, and he certainly will have more during the summer vacation.

Did you notice there were more dogs running around town (and the country) in 1951 than usual? There must've been.

County Clerk Charlie Delap reports he ran out of licenses to issue them.

Back in 1949 he bought 4,500 of the metal dog license tags and issued only 3,200. The next year, 1950, he bought 4,000 tags and issued 3,600.

So for 1951 he bought 4,000 again—and ran out.

Congress Keeps Close Eye On High-Level RFC Bosses

WASHINGTON (AP)—What is happening as the much-investigated Reconstruction Finance Corporation again claims the attention of senators Thursday.

Sen. Fulbright (D-Ark.), who headed the original Senate probe of the big government lending agency, told a reporter that members of his banking subcommittee are going to "watch very closely" all changes at the higher levels of RFC management.

His curiosity was aroused by the way the White House handled the sudden departure from RFC of Peter I. Bukowski, who has been No. 2 man to W. Stuart Symington in a housecleaning of the agency.

Symington himself is reported by reliable sources to have asked President Truman for permission to resign and return to private life.

Symington and Bukowski went to RFC last summer to become the big two in charge of a major job resulting from the Senate subcommittee's charges that the agency had yielded to pressures of a political influence ring having White House contacts.

Fulbright said he was concerned by reports that the White House—possibly through an oversight—failed to notify Bukowski before announcing that Mr. Truman had accepted his resignation.

Bukowski, a Republican, had won praise from both Democratic and Republican members of the Fulbright subcommittee for his work with Symington.

Cardinal Visits U.S. Naval Base

TOKYO (AP)—Francis Cardinal Spellman, archbishop of New York, toured the U.S. Naval Base at nearby Yokosuka Thursday and joked briefly with sailors in a cove line.

The Cardinal celebrated mass in the Chapel of Hope on the Naval station and inspected Naval installations on the sprawling base, including the hospital.
