

Farm Building Plans On Hand From State College

Want to build a water wheel? A merry-go-round for a playground? A manure pit? A nut drier? A hay stacker? A house? A barn? These and many other plans are among more than 300 available in the Oregon State college plan service. Each plan is drawn in such specific detail that even amateur carpenters can follow them.

In nearly every instance the plans grew from a definite need. When college barns or other buildings were constructed, plans were adjusted for use on a smaller scale. Whenever demand was strong for such things as sheep dipping vats, feed mixers, milk houses, or other equipment, they were developed by the agricultural engineers for the OSC experiment station and the plans made available for public use.

Following the war, when there was a great need for more housing for farm labor, plans were developed for small, low-cost rural houses. These followed research by home economics and farm management workers so that features were included which farm laborers particularly wanted.

The first list of plans was published in 1936 by the extension service but as the project grew it was reorganized and placed under the direction of OSC agricultural engineers. All other such information was coordinated under this plan so that USDA bulletins on construction could be easily accessible. This eliminated unnecessary duplication and the service was made more complete.

Professor H. R. Sinnard, agricultural engineer for the OSC experiment station, reports that county agents, home demonstration agents, and extension workers help many interested persons locate the building information they need, while others write directly to the college for plans. Oregon material, after thorough testing, is used in the plans. A small service charge is made to cover blueprinting costs.
