There seems to have been little talk about our black snow problem. Whether this is due to an improvement in the situation or to a falling off in interest I'm not alert enough to say. Frankly I haven't paid much attention to it lately.

While walking the downtown area this morning I noted a generous coating of black ash being deposited in the already-dirty snow, blowing in the eyes of passerby and making the cars look even grimmer than usual.

Since there has been so little talk of late it would seem that the improvement must be there. If so, splendid. After all, snow does little to enhance the esthetic beauty of our already ravaged downtown area.

Speaking of snow, had a frightening experience this morning. Had an errand to run up on Hot Springs Hill but no car. The old pre-war truck I was frozen up as tight as the beer locker at a WCTU meeting.

Frank Hurd, a staunch stay of the J. W. Kerns firm and well known in the Basin, has conducted his own political poll among a hundred and fifty voters of the area.

As on the matter of roadside signs which clutter up the atmosphere and obscure the view, a newspaperman doesn't say too much about the city's proposal to sell advertising on the parking meters.

From the city officials' standpoint, there's the matter of legality. The legality of parking meters themselves has been questioned many times. Meters have gotten by on the basis of regulating traffic.

It has been ruled, by the attorney general of Washington state, that it is not legal for anyone else to place advertising on parking meters or any other traffic control device.

A property owner actually owns the sidewalk and half of the street in front of his property. Street owners have been restrained from advertising thereon.

These are questions to be considered, but they're not the reason for saying that it's not very good advertising.

Let's think of the resident of Bonanza, or Alturas, or one of the suburban sections for that matter.

CAPE MAY, N. J. — Why work for a living if you can make a living by playing? The pleasure of finding they could turn a hobby into a business has been a real adventure in contentment for Ken and Marge Ewer.

So he quit his job and came to this resort center to rest. After three days of sitting in a rocking chair on the front porch he decided that wasn't living either.

What would they do? He and his wife shared a lifelong interest in antiques and handicraft. They decided to make their hobby their career.

Today they ship their home-made candles to every state, several foreign countries. Another popular item has been a furniture polish and scratch remover set.

Neighbors interested in handicraft began dropping in on the couple asking if they couldn't be of any help.

Now the Ewers have a staff of "Colonial Craftsmen" who each year turn out thousands of items like hand-carved snipe decoys, butter paddles, driftwood picture frames and decorative wooden floor scoops.

Considerable fuss is being made these days in the financial circles about two projects, or maybe it's a two-headed project. The brokerage boys would like to see more "small investors in the stock market."

There are all sorts of signs of this activity. Special courses for women in investment are springing up all over the place, and women are being urged to attend so that they can ultimately amaze their friends with their knowledge.

Perhaps in the interim caused by the death of King George VI Britain's left-wing Laborites, led by Aneurin Bevan, will indulge in some "ober second thoughts about Anglo-American relations."

Bevan's first thoughts, voiced in the first phase of the debate in Parliament on Prime Minister Churchill's visit to the United States, were strongly anti-American.

On the other end of the operation are the corporations themselves, now very conscious of their stockholders as individuals.

After all, the savings bank never got so excited about my deposits, and it never had invited me to a meeting complete with free buffet.

There's no substitute for comfort. A man with his mind made up does not look for facts that run counter to his conclusions.
