It takes an air view to show how Palo Alto's new homes have pushed out over hundreds of acres which were mostly open fields just ten years ago.

Look what's happened to Palo Alto

You'll probably find this is the telephone story of your town, too

If you knew Palo Alto, California, as it was when World War II began, you'll remember it as a pleasant suburban town of San Francisco commuters and Stanford University students ... a business center of the Peninsula. Population at the beginning of 1942: 17,000. Annual income: $27 million. Then came the big war and postwar boom in the West. Palo Alto, with lots of open land around it, got even more than its share of this growth. Today it numbers more than 31,000 people. Its income has soared to more than $67 million. In these two figures lies the reason for ten years of amazing telephone growth: More people in town-and more of those people wanting telephones. And we met this challenge by building facilities faster than ever before.

Almost the moment materials were available after the war, telephone construction was in high gear. For wartime shortages had built a big list of people waiting for service. We had to catch up on those orders and build to meet the new orders that flooded in steadily. Just since 1945, for instance, we've put up hundreds of new poles in the Palo Alto exchange... we've added enough cable circuits, linking new telephones with the central office, to circle the earth almost twice.

And in the central office, which had to be enlarged to twice its former size, we rushed intricate switching equipment into service, increasing our call-handling capacity to four times what it was in 1942. Today, after putting more than $4 million into Palo Alto's telephone system since 1942, we have almost two and a half times as many telephones at work. And with all this, we're still not able to fill all orders as rapidly as they come in. But, in the face of increasingly severe shortage of materials, we'll keep doing all we can to take care of present orders and to meet the demands for service which we know still lie ahead.

Your telephone is one of today's best bargains

Up and down the West, the Palo Alto story has been told in hundreds of towns. Fast as the population has grown, the telephone has grown at an even faster rate... twice as fast in the territory we serve. For at today's prices, the telephone is so economical more people can afford it...so useful, more people want it.
