periments in which scientists learned how to make sterile hybrids fertile. Dr. G. Ledyard Stebbins, Jr., geneticist in the University of California College of Agriculture, led about 100...

Hybrids, or crosses between one kind of living thing and another, usually are sterile. Using two different methods, Dr. Stebbins and associates induced fertility into several types of plant crosses.

HYBRID PRODUCED — One was a cross between blue wild rye and squirrel tail grass. The natural rye plant does well in the California foothills but cannot stand drought. Squirrel tail grass is drought resistant but has spikes on it that makes it dangerous for stock feed. The result of the cross was a plant resembling blue wild rye that was drought resistant and had spikes less formidable than squirrel tail grass.

These first crosses were sterile — seedless. Dr. Stebbins propagated them by cutting off stems and stocks and coaxing them to grow along with some of the parent blue wild rye plants. This association with the parent evidently did some good. Among 48,000 blossoms produced by the second-generation hybrids the experimenters found a single fertile seed.

The lone seed produced a plant with a few more good seeds. From those beginnings the new plant has grown successfully in several places and it stands to better adapted to the place or the climate in which it started to grow. The geneticist also reported on another way of producing fertile new plant types. It is done by doubling the number of chromosomes or heredity carriers in plant cells.

POISON HELPED — Colchicine, a poison derived from a common plant, is used to bring this about. The poison interferes with cell division, the basic mechanism of growth. It does not, however, interfere with the process by which a cell doubles the number of its chromosomes just before dividing.

A colchicine-poisoned cell keeps on working internally. Its chromosomes reproduce themselves and it thus has a double set of hereditary carriers. This overgrown cell will shake off the effects of the poison, again double its chromosomes and divide into two cells, each of which will have twice as many heredity carriers as the parent cell before it was poisoned.

These double-heredity cells continue to reproduce their kind indefinitely and they build themselves into a plant resembling that of their untreated ancestors but having important differences.

The process has been used to improve grapes, bananas, pineapples. But it can also increase the chances for producing a fertile hybrid in case it is crossed with some other species of plant. It multiplies the probabilities for the pairing-off of chromosomes from cells of another plant species into a combination that will produce a new type of individual.
