Voters Decide McKellar Fate

NASHVILLE Tenn. (AP)— Showers fell over big portions of Tennessee Thursday but election officials said they expect the heaviest vote in history for the Democratic and Republican primaries.

Reports from the major cities of Knoxville, Memphis and Chattanooga said the rain would have little effect on the anticipated record turnout of voters.

Nashville, the capitol city also found voters braving showers to reach the polls.

Their votes will decide the political future of K. D. McKellar, 83-year-old dean of the Senate in point of service, and Gov. Gordon Browing, who is out for a third consecutive two-year term.

And they will determine, perhaps finally, what power remains in the hands of E. H. Crump, Memphis political leader whose grip on state-wide politics was broken four years ago by Browning and Sen. Estes Kefauver.

BITTER ORATORY

Spurred on by bitter campaign oratory, the voters concentrated on the torrid races for the Democratic nominations for the U.S. Senate and the governorship.

There were hot contests for both Democratic and Republican Congressional nominations and in local general elections. But the talk around the polling places was centered chiefly on the chances of McKellar's winning an unprecedented seventh term in the Senate and Browining retaining his hold on the governorship.

For the first time in Tennessee history, voting was entirely free of poll-tax requirements.

A record registration of 1,339,259 was qualified to vote in the primary.

McKellar, chairman of the Appropriations committee, faces his toughest opposition in decades in 44-year-old Rep. Albert Gore, who's Fourth District was eliminated by the state's 1951 redistricting act.
