Occupation Not Entertainment Best Solution

"Children must have fun, seems to be the slogan of American parents," says British philosopher, Dr. Cyril Joad.

Well, that has become our philosophy, hasn't it? And to carry it out, American mothers wear themselves ragged trying to see that their children are constantly entertained. And American fathers wear themselves out trying to foot the bill for all this constant entertainment.

If Mama isn't taking the children to swimming or dancing or a movie or whatever, she is being nagged to let them do this or that—and made to feel like a heel if she doesn't.

"What can I do?" has become the $64 question so far as the modern small fry are concerned. And Mama feels it is up to her to supply the answer.

This effort to keep the children entertained is a constant drain on Mama's time and strength and on Papa's pocket book.

It might be worth while, if this desperate effort to keep children constantly entertained made them happy. But it doesn't. Before one pleasure is finished they are already wondering what they are going to do next. All that the struggle to entertain them does is make them restless and demanding. They don't really appreciate how much is done for them because there is always some kid whose family does more. And they aren't bashful about pointing out that fact, either.
