Oregon Beef On Increase

Oregon had one of the largest increases in beef cattle numbers of all 46 states in the 52 years since 1900, a study conducted by the American National Cattlemen's Association, Denver, Colo., indicated today.

Oregon had an increase of 46 per cent as numbers of beef cattle jumped from 513,000 in 1900 to 965,000 today. The state also moved from 26th to 18th spot in national ranking.

Oregon's percentage increase was exceeded by only five other states: North Dakota, Montana, Louisiana, South Dakota and Florida.

Texas, with more than 7,350,000 beef cattle, is the perennial leader of the states although its percentage increase was less than one per cent in the half-century. Following the Lone Star state in the top ten are Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, South Dakota, Missouri, Oklahoma, Illinois, Montana and Colorado.

Changing national economy and land needs have brought decreases in beef cattle numbers in many eastern and northern states, notably New York, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania which were bypassed by as many as 21 other states. However, western, southern and midwestern production has increased enough to provide 52,192,000 beef cattle this year, compared with 43,195,000 in 1900.
