New Tax Law May Be Tough on Investors

By CLARKE BEACH
WASHINGTON (AP)—If you've picked some lemons in the stock market this year, they'll all look equally sour when you get around to balancing your losses against gains for income tax purposes.

The new revenue act makes no distinction between long-term and short-term capital losses—that is, losses on securities you held for six months or more and those you sold in less than six months.

Under the old law, you could deduct 100 per cent of your short-term losses but only 50 per cent of your long-term losses.

That encouraged security market customers to do just the opposite from what framers of the revenue act wanted them to do.

The revenue act exerts a somewhat stabilizing influence on securities markets by taxing only half the capital gains if stocks are held for six months or more before selling. If held for less than six months, the gains are taxed 100 per cent—giving Uncle Sam a fat cut from the melon when the taxpayer gets a quick profit.

In what appears now to have been oversimplification or oversight, the tax legislators treated losses the same way—allowing the taxpayer full loss if it was short-term but only half the loss if it was long-term.

As a result, the practice of selling stock to establish losses for income tax purposes, which is usual when the year is drawing to a close, was stimulated. The owner often sold his losses sooner than he wished in order to get his full 100 per cent deduction. This deduction encouraged short-term dealings, which tend to be speculative and thus inflationary.

So when the act was amended in 1951, effective this year, it provided that all losses could be fully deducted. They can be used to offset capital gains for tax purposes, and if they exceed the capital gains for the year, up to $1,000 of the loss can be deducted from ordinary income.

Here's the way the revenue act works for Smith, who nets $8,000 a year from his law practice:

He made a killing this year in Blue Gulch Uranium shares, buying in February and selling in October, making a long-term capital gain of $2,000.

As the price of the stuff began to zoom in May, Smith got excited and bought some shares of Magna Queen Foolsgold. He bought it promptly before a long drop, until he had a loss of $1,500, when he sold it. This was in October—a short-term capital loss.

On his income tax form, Smith will add the $2,000 gain to his $8,000 income, then deduct the $1,500 loss. Next he will figure his net capital gain, $2,000 minus $1,500, or $500. Deducting half of this, or $250, from the total, he will have left a taxable income of $8,250.

If Smith had had the same lurid experiences in the market last year, the law at that time would have left him a taxable income of only $7,500, because he could have deducted 100 per cent of his short-term loss against only 50 per cent of his long-term gain.

He would have added one-half of his long-term gain, or $1,000, to his $8,000 ordinary income, and then he would have deducted $1,500.

Under last year's law, however, if Smith had hopefully hung on to Magna Queen until December, selling it just before the close of the year and making it a long-term loss, he would have wound up with exactly the taxable income he has today—$8,250.

He would have deducted half the loss, or $750, from half the gain, or $1,000, adding the $250 difference to his ordinary income.
