Guy Madison Stages Big Comeback In Cowboy Roles

By BOB THOMAS
HOLLYWOOD — It's amazing what a couple of years in TV can do.
 Guy Madison, whose film career was standing still two years ago, turned to a TV series about Wild Bill Hickok. Now he has loped back at Feather River.
 With the film job and portraying Hickok on radio and TV, plus tours to promote his merchandise, Madison is a busy cowpoke. He has even dropped 15 pounds in the rigorous routine. But he doesn't seem to mind. He remembers other days.
 "Sometimes I would go a year and a half between pictures," he recalled. "I was under contract to David O. Selznick for six years and never did make a picture for him."
 Madison has had an amazing career. His film debut was a three-minute bit in Selznick's "Since You Went Away." Madison, who was in the service at the time, went away to the Navy, but he left an impression in the film. Bobbysox-era went wild for him, and the Selznick press agents fed the fire with fan magazine layouts of the young man's muscular frame.

 Selznick signed him to a contract after he left the Navy. He was thrust into a lead with Dorothy McGuire in "Till the End of Time," which Guy considers his best picture. But his film career was anticlimactic after that.
 His boss loaned him out for an occasional picture. In between, he posed for photo layouts and did some stage work. Once he toured the Eastern states for eight months. It was good experience for a tyro actor who had never appeared before the footlights until then. All that experience but not pictures.
 "Selznick went off to Europe and it didn't look as if he would make any pictures," Madison said. "So I asked for my release and got it." And after that?

 "I starved a little," he said. But that didn't last for long. He and Andy Devine got together on a TV series built around the Wild Bill Hickok character. Both of them tossed their future with it, even to the turning down pictures in the months between making the pilot film and selling the series.
 Their gamble paid off and his round body caught on with the masses. Their series in every grocery store and The TV series also led show and to the movies which is a gold mine for cowboys.
