

High Taxes Population To Keep Starving Culture The Go, But Hopes Sag For Future Work

You may prefer to live in Britain if you live in Britain... you can call yourself a patriot... your 3 cents... annual budget... the arts in this country... keep... office... opera...

house, Covent Garden. Since it was rescued from its wartime fate as a dance hall and reconstituted in 1946, its opera company has staged Strauss' "Salome," with decor by Salvador Dali, and Alben Berg's "Wozzeck." Its resident ballet company—Sadlers Wells—is regarded as about the finest outside Russia.

But even if the house "full" notices are up—which is often—Covent Garden loses $1,500 a night. Or take symphony orchestras. There are about 10 of them in London and the larger provincial towns. Ever since the war Britons have flocked to hear them. But a permanent symphony orchestra can count itself lucky if it gets through the year without losing at least $70,000.

The small repertory theaters struggling in the provincial towns can just about break even on takings of around $1,500 a week and that only by paring salaries to the bone.

With British genius for improvisation, the business of acting as fairy godmother to the arts has been taken over by a body known as the Arts Council, established in 1946.

Its unpaid members are chosen by the chancellor of the Exchequer on a rotation basis. They work hand in glove with some of the larger permanent cultural organizations and get a good picture of future plans.

In the light of these plans, the council sends the chancellor of the Exchequer a budget every year. It disburses the grant it receives to the cultural bodies—always keeping a bit in hand to help some of the smaller associations who may send in a last minute SOS.

HARWICH, England (AP) — The Danish luxury passenger ship Kronprins Frederik rolled over on its side Monday after being swept by fire.

Flames still shot from the forward upper deck and a fire official said the 2,800-ton ship, even though half-submerged, might go on burning for two or three days.
