No City Pay On Street Job

A story in yesterday's Herald and News was in error in saying that the city had helped in small degree to finance a street widening project on Eldorado Street. City Engineer Taxl Thomas said this morning the former city administration had informally agreed the city would assume a percentage of the Eldorado widening expense as well as on a 3-block paving project now proposed for California Avenue. But, Thomas said, the city has not actually paid for any Eldorado work. When the California Avenue project was discussed at Monday night's council meeting, Councilman Wendell Smith raised the question of the city aiding in the financing and other councilmen appeared reluctant for the city to do so.

Smith maintained the city was in a sense obligated to do so since California Avenue is to be made a 36-foot boulevard whereas the average residential street is only 26 feet wide.
