

British Newspapers Sluggish about Backing into Margaret Love Yarn

By ALVIN J. STEINKOPF
LONDON (AP)—After a hesitant start, the British press is publishing more and more about Princess Margaret's reported romance with a divorced officer of the Royal Air Force.

The way the British newspapers are backing into this story—the Commonwealth's heart throbs of the year—resembles in some respects the manner in which they handled the abdication of King Edward VIII in 1936.

SMILING PRINCESS Margaret waves gaily to greeters on her return to London by air from South Africa, where she and her mother made a 16-day tour of Rhodesia. Among those missing at the airport was RAF Capt. Peter Townsend, the aviator with whom her name has been romantically linked. He was sent to Brussels two days ago as embassy air attache amid widespread speculation that he was being exiled because the princess reportedly wants to marry him.

ward VIII in 1936. Now, as then, an apparent effort to bottle up a secret failed. The episodes have similar ingredients. A royal person falls in love with a person disqualified from moving in royal circles. Romance tries to triumph over the prohibitions of the Church of England and the strict code of conduct which tradition imposes on the monarchy.

which tugs at human sympathies and makes all the sentimentalists in the land exclaim, "The poor dear!" It's a story worth telling, and for weeks keen editors were vying to get at it.

Before Edward abdicated in 1936 to marry Wallis Simpson, commoner and divorcee, the country's newspapers for a long time observed a conspiracy of silence. The monarchy holds a very special place in the esteem of the British. Seventeen years ago, confronted with a King willing to give up his throne for love, many editors felt the story was too hot to handle.

The abdication was accomplished with a minimum of public discussion at home, though French and American newspapers were full of the intriguing details and travelers returning to Britain told their neighbors what was going on in their own palace.

In the case of Margaret and RAF Group Capt. Peter Townsend, the newspapers also exercised restraint, but not so much.

The first reference was made June 14 by a Sunday newspaper which said the British public had a right to know what nonsense was being published about the princess in the United States.

It named the handsome captain, reported circumstances of his divorce, but insisted that any speculation as to his possible marriage was preposterous. It catalogued the details being carried by the American papers, and denied them one by one.

Three weeks later, after the dam had burst, this Sunday paper prided itself on having been the first to "tell the story" in London.

Now the headlines are getting bigger, and the public plunges in with letters to the newspapers. It named the handsome captain, reported circumstances of his divorce, but insisted that any speculation as to his possible marriage was preposterous. It catalogued the details being carried by the American papers, and denied them one by one.

The princess is reminded that as a royal personage, very close to the throne, she must live an exemplary life. She is reminded that, should Queen Elizabeth II become incapable of carrying out her functions before Prince Charles comes of age, she under present legislation would become regent.

But there have been suggestions in government quarters that regency laws might be changed to shift Margaret's responsibilities to the Duke of Edinburgh.

The general trend of letters from the public seem to be sympathetic toward the princess. There are demands that the church change its attitude toward divorce. Their pretty princess, say her supporters, ought to be a happy princess, and if the course of true love isn't smooth, the appropriate authorities, state and church, should remove the obstacles which stand in the way of her heart's desire.

The case of the vivacious princess, and ex-King Edward aren't comparable, her friends argue. He was on the throne, and his position was admittedly touchy, Margaret is close to the throne, but the chances of her ever being called to it are remote, many declare.

The substantial Manchester Guardian struck a forthright blow in the princess' favor.

"She is close to the succession to the throne, and she performs public functions," the Guardian said. "But the succession is already pretty well assured without her; and there are other solutions if a regency should unhappily become necessary. And the mass of ordinary simple people would not care two hoots, when she came to lay a foundation stone or open a town hall, whether her husband had been married before or not. There is no harm in getting things straight."

Regency Act Changes Talked

LONDON (AP)—Laborite Marcus Lipton said today he will ask the government in the House of Commons next Wednesday what it plans to do about changing Britain's regency act so Princess Margaret would be free to marry anyone she pleases.

Under the act—passed in 1937 soon after King George VI was enthroned—Princess Margaret would become regent if anything happened to her sister, Queen Elizabeth II, during the infancy of Prince Charles and Princess Anne.

The vivacious 23-year-old princess is said to want to marry Royal Air Force Group Capt. Peter Townsend, 38, for nine years the "royal enemy." He divorced his wife and although he was the innocent party in the proceedings, the Church of England and a part of British officialdom frowns on the reported romance.

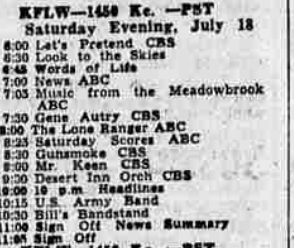

Britain's leading Roman Catholic newspaper, The Catholic Herald, said this week Margaret should surrender all royal rank and status if she decides to marry Townsend. She is thrusting in line to the throne. The government is believed to be discussing changes in the regency act with governments of the Commonwealth countries.

One suggestion is that Queen Elizabeth may follow the example of her great-grandmother, Queen Victoria, and appoint her husband as regent to act in the event of her death or inability to act.

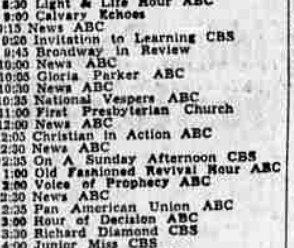

If the Duke of Edinburgh were to take Margaret's place as regent, it would remove one obstacle to the royal romance.

Margaret returned yesterday from a 16-day tour of Rhodesia where she and Queen Mother Elizabeth took part in 100th anniversary celebrations of Cecil Rhodes birth.

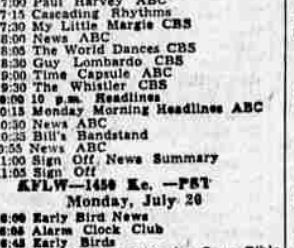

Two days before Margaret's return, Townsend was ordered to Brussels for a tour of duty as air attache in Britain's embassy there. Some Britons have accused officialdom of "exiling" him as a rebuke to the romance.
