Convict Farm Labor to End
SALEM — Convict labor won't be used to harvest crops on private farms any more, penitentiary warden Clarence T. Gladden said Tuesday.
 The new ruling followed criticism which developed when it was learned that prisoners had been picking prunes at the Leo Spitzbart farm in West Salem. Spitzbart is manager of the Oregon State Farm.
 The prunes, Gladden said, are canned in the prison cannery and eaten by inmates.
 Gladden said he didn't know that convict labor was being used at the farm.
 "There were other similar arrangements that were in force when I came here, I stopped those and I would have stopped this one had I known about it," he said.
 Gladden said he learned these details of the arrangements Tuesday.
 Robbin D. Day, a Salem attorney had signed an agreement to sell the prunes. Receiving the produce were Francis Wonderly, prison industries supervisor, and J. B. Schaller, supervisor of the prison cannery.
 The agreement provided that the prunes be picked by prison labor and hauled to the penitentiary in state trucks. Day was to receive the market price, less standard picking rates and less a hauling charge.
 What money, if any, Day might realize from the transaction was not learned.
 State Sen. Richard L. Neuberger was critical of the agreement.
 "If these deals are to be made by the prison, they should be open to all farmers—not just to powerful figures in the state administration," he said. "If necessary, I favor legislation to outlaw the use of convict labor for picking crops on private farms owned by state political appointees."
 The fact that convict labor was being used on the Spitzbart farm first came to light Monday when a prisoner escaped from a work crew there. He is Melvin H. Logan who still is at large.

Handicapped Put to Work
 An agency of the State of Oregon last year restored 575 handicapped persons to useful employment and in so doing showed a profit of 84 per cent on the investment.
 So declared Marion C. Smith, 1953 chairman of Governor Paul L. Patterson's Committee on employment of the physically handicapped. Klamath Falls' chairman of this year's committee for the promotion of "National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week," slated Oct. 4-10, is Charlie McFarlan.
 Elaborating on his statement, the State Chairman said the Division of Vocational Rehabilitation gave medical treatment and training services to 575 persons in 1952 and placed them in jobs for which they had been trained, at a cost to the State of $155,384, or $270.23 per person.
 Before rehabilitation, the total annual income of this group was $159,539. After rehabilitation, it was estimated at $1,478,384. Subtracting the cost of rehabilitation, the profit on the investment in dollars and cents amounts to $49 per person.
 Besides restoring these persons to self-supporting, tax-paying members of their communities, Smith pointed out that 81 of the 575 persons had previously been costing the State approximately $105,270 per year in public welfare grants. "It cost $19,322 to rehabilitate these 81 persons," Smith said. "They are now supporting their families and earning approximately $195,260 a year."
 Local Chairman McFarlan warned, however, that the job is not finished, because there are still an estimated 10,800 vocationally handicapped persons in Oregon either seeking jobs or needing rehabilitation before they can work, and he said the purpose of the annual NEPH week is to bring these facts to the public's attention.
 As part of the week's activities, members of the local NEPH committee are visiting various organization meetings to speak on the program. Tonight the Rev. Keith Fields will visit the Tokete Lions club meeting at 6:30 p.m. at the Winema.
 Thursday Sen. Phil Hitchcock will speak at the noon meeting of the Kiwanis Club at the Willard; Friday Bob Chandler will speak to Rotary Club members at their noon meeting at the Willard.
