"Using a Light Meter With Your Movie Camera"

To determine the proper lighting for your home movies, either the built-in exposure guide on your camera or an easy-to-operate light meter may be used. Both of these methods of determining lighting effectiveness are usually accurate, both will give good pictures, though the photo electric light meter will be more accurate under a variety of lighting conditions than the chart; but emphasis must be placed on correct usage. If they are used in the correct manner, both methods will get good pictures.

Because most light meters are built for use with still cameras, many photo fans have trouble setting the movie camera according to the reading on their light meter. For example I was asked, "On a light meter that does not show speed in frames per second, what setting should I use?" If you too have wondered the same thing, remember this: Movies are a long series of still pictures which are sometimes called frames. So when I was asked about frames per second, in reality I was asked about "shutter speed." On movie cameras, under ordinary condition, you leave the camera set on the normal speed of 16 frames (pictures) per second, and change the f stop (light opening) to adjust for the differences in lighting. But if you want to take slow motion or speed-up action in movies, simply set the meter on a shutter speed equivalent to a frame (movie) speed.

This chart will show the equivalent shutter speed:

12 frames per second equals 1/25 of a second shutter; 18 frames per second equals 1/30 of a second shutter; 24 frames per second equals 1/50 of a second shutter; 32 frames per second equals 1/60 of a second shutter; 48 frames per second equals 1/100 of a second shutter; 64 frames per second equals 1/125 of a second shutter.

The chart works in this manner: If you want to set the frame speed on your movie camera to slow motion, 24 frames per second, merely use the shutter speed closest to twice the number of frames per second. In this case the correct setting would be 1/50 of a second. This is a general guide for use in helping you use your meter in taking those Christmas movies. For answers to all your photographic questions, visit Dal Swigger, your cameraman, at Standard Optical Co., 715 Main in Klamath Falls and talk over your problems photographically.

REMEMBER! Christmas movies are swell to give, why not get together with the family and give Dad a movie for this Christmas. Drop in, and we'll talk over your purchase of an inexpensive 8mm movie camera outfit for Christmas 1953. OPEN TONIGHT 'TIL 9:00 O'CLOCK
