Competition helps develop better products for you

WE LIVE BETTER IN AMERICA because competition for your trade among businesses tends to develop better products at lower prices. Competition among individuals, businesses and industries is on the increase today, as our industrial economy approaches greater stability. Products of the forest industry, for example, must compete with the rapidly expanding list of other building materials. To hold our share of the market, as in the past, we must maintain the present high quality of our lumber products. In addition, we must continue to improve manufacturing and processing methods, selling techniques and service to customers.

The ability of the forest industry to meet competition is important to you because more than half of the Pacific Northwest's economy is based on that industry. So no matter what your occupation, the steady operation of the industry helps you. It means steady payrolls, stable community economy and a sound tax base to support schools and other government services.

America's most charming homes are built of wood

Like the clothes you wear, homes should express your personal tastes and ideas. And you'll notice that usually the homes of greatest charm and warmth are built of wood. Only wood offers such wide variety in architectural possibilities... plus economy. Color schemes can be readily changed. These are some of the reasons why 8 out of 10 homes in the nation are built of wood, and why most thoughtful builders are choosing wood. Our industry must continue to improve its products and services to retain this favorable competitive position. Remember, wood must compete with them all... brick, concrete, aluminum, glass, plastic, compositions and steel.
