New Brain Chemical May Aid In Blood Pressure Battle; Work Being Pushed

By ALTON L. BLAKESLEE
Associated Press Science Reporter
ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. (AP) — A mysterious new brain chemical may help you keep your blood pressure down despite arguments and other emotional strains of life, a physician said Tuesday.

This chemical is found in nerve centers deep in the brains of humans, cows and horses.

It is not yet known exactly what it is. New experiments with it were described by Dr. Alfred Leimdorfer of the Stritch School of Medicine, Loyola University, Chicago, to the Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology.

Extracts of this nerve tissue injected into dogs and cats cause a deep and long fall in their blood pressure, he said. The nerve chemical seems to play a role in normal regulation of blood pressure.

Nerve impulses and emotional strains undoubtedly play a part in raising blood pressure, Leimdorfer said. Emotional reactions can bring release of hormones, such as adrenalin, which kick up blood pressure. If that happens often enough or long enough, arteries can become damaged.

The brain receives all sensations and the brain's control switches regulate your reactions. The brain thus is "the main line of attack and defense in this emotional struggle," Leimdorfer said.

It regulates what happens to you under emotional strains.

Leimdorfer said that in normal animals or perhaps people the presence or absence of the strange brain chemical can help keep blood pressure at normal levels. Failure to make enough of it may be a cause sometimes of high pressure.

If the brain chemical can be identified and purified, it might be important in medical treatments of high blood pressure, he said.
