

Two Price Plan Used On Surplus

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Eisenhower administration once rejected the "two-price" plan as a device for supporting farm income, but it now is turning to that very mechanism in an effort to unload heavy crop surpluses.

The Agriculture Department now is using this plan in efforts to sell at home and abroad more wheat, flour, butter, cheese, dried milk, flaxseed and cottonseed oil, and some fruits. Corn, oats, rye, barley and grain sorghum soon may be added to this list.

Under the two-price plan, surplus commodities are sold abroad and for designated domestic uses at prices below those paid producers under a government price support system. The loss is absorbed by the Treasury.

The National Grange and some other farm groups strongly urged the administration to include such a plan for some crops in the farm program President Eisenhower sent Congress in January. The administration farm program is based on flexible price floors, instead of the rigid, high level props now in use.

The Grange, in advocating the two-price system, would not require the taxpayers to pay the full support price for all that farmers produced.

Instead, farmers would get the full support price for that portion of a surplus crop consumed in this country for specified uses. But that part of the crop marketed abroad or for general use in this country would be sold for whatever price it would get under competitive conditions.

Wheat, for example, is bringing the farmer an average of about $2.06 a bushel. But sales are being made abroad at about 60 cents a bushel below the price the farmer gets, with the government absorbing the loss. The same goes for flour.

City Dads Hold Quiet Meeting

With Mayor Paul Landry and Council President Don Kenyon both absent, council took care of only routine business, that did not require a resolution or ordinance, since these can be signed only by the mayor or president.

On the thinking that whoever signed an ordinance relating to the proposed condemnation of certain buildings on Wendling and Alameda Streets would want to be present at the hearing, scheduled for last night, council voted to "continue and set aside the hearing until next Monday night."

Routine business included appointment of a new real estate appraisal committee and a complaint from a property owner of damage which he said was caused by the city.

Council accepted the resignation of George McIntyre, Fred Coler and Gomer Jones to the city Real Estate Appraisal Committee, and approved the mayor's appointment of Ron Fisher, Andy Silani and Bob Veatch, to the committee.

A letter from Richard L. Hessig, who lives at 410 Hillside, blamed a city gas pump for the settling of his house at 135 North Broad.

Hessig's letter said that when a Central Fire Department gas pump was installed in 1950, the excavation for the tank was made deeper than his foundation and that now the building is settling on the northwest side; the walls and foundation are cracked.

He also declared that gas vapors from the tank vent go into one of his apartment windows. Hessig asked that the city rectify this.
