

Queen Holds Traditional Investiture

LONDON, (AP)—In a gilt and cream throne room at Buckingham Palace the Queen was holding an investiture.

Two hundred and fifty of the Queen's loyal subjects were in line before her waiting for their honors. Around her were generals, admirals, court officials, ladies in waiting and guards in Tudor uniforms.

But the orchestra was out of tune. A violinist sawed down hard on the wrong note.

Queen Elizabeth II went on awarding Military Crosses, Military Medals, creating knights and giving out Orders of the Bath and the British Empire. She either did not notice the sour note or she was being ladylike.

While the ceremony proceeded, a helicopter whirled noisily into the sky from the palace lawn. The plane carried the Duke of Edinburgh on a visit to an agricultural research station.

Hollywood would stage an investiture far differently than Buckingham Palace. Hollywood would have the Queen in tulle, robes and satin. Instead, in the investiture last week, she wore a light green and white silk dress. It was sleeveless and short.

Hollywood would have the audience cloaked in quiet dignity. In real life, the audience fidgeted, twisted and turned. The folks—most of them proud daughters and wives just could not resist looking around for dad, about to become a knight. When they finally spotted the old man among the 250 others, most of them uttered a bit and slipped him a quick wave.

There was once a time when these investitures were more solemn and royal. Queen Victoria liked them regal. But to become a knight these days you don't even need a morning suit or dress uniform. You can step up and become a member of the Order of the British Empire in the same clothes you wear to work.
