

Relative Of Fort Klamath Woman Appointed Ike Aide

FORT KLAMATH — In April and May of this year, a special U.S. Government Trade Mission was appointed by President Eisenhower to explore the possibilities of expanding United States trade, mainly agriculture, with the countries of South East Asia. Included in this group was Earl E. Hanway, owner of two newspapers and a radio station at Casper, Wyoming, and brother-in-law of Mrs. Walter J. Wright, local resident.

Hanway was chosen solely as a newspaper man and played the role of observer on the trip. Four such missions were planned, and Hanway was given his choice of which he would take — North Europe, South Europe, South East Asia or Central and South America. As he had visited some of the European countries in 1950 and others in Central America, Hanway accepted the Asian appointment, with the condition that Mrs. Hanway could accompany the group at his personal expense. It was arranged for the trip to be made on commercial rather than military airplanes, making it possible for Mrs. Hanway to go along. At first the men somewhat resented her presence, but this was changed by her help to fellow travelers in purchases for folks at home, mending clothing and other acts of kindness and usefulness.

Hanway is also chairman of the board of one of his newspapers, the Tribune Herald, and the travels and impression of the Asian countries and places visited are described by him in a 32-page illustrated booklet entitled "Round the World on a Mission," a reprint of a series of weekly articles appearing in the Tribune Herald and Casper Morning Star. Pictures were taken in Pakistan, India, Thailand, Indonesia, Singapore, the Philippines, Hong Kong and Japan.

Before the 19 members of the groups left, they were thoroughly briefed when summoned to Washington April seventh for a four day conference session. Advisers were officials of the Foreign Operations Administration, referred to as FOA, the Departments of State, Commerce and Treasury, agencies of the Department of Agriculture. They also met with Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson, representatives of the House Agricultural Committee, the House Agricultural Appropriations Committee.

Before their departure, embassy representatives in Washington of several countries to be visited met with the group, telling of the political, economical and agricultural aspects of their countries and giving the characteristics. President Eisenhower met with the group at the White House, telling members that the primary mission was to seek ways and means of increasing international trade under conditions that would favorably affect the prosperity of both the purchaser and seller, stressing the fact that things would have to be done in countries visited, "first find out what products of ours they can use and explore the possibilities of making them one of our customers for these products; second, determine what products of theirs would be useful to us and help develop plans by which this trade could be of maximum mutual benefit."

Each man of the mission was given the designation of "consultant to the Secretary of Agriculture" and in addition to having transportation furnished, received regular government per diem, which fluctuates according to countries, rates of hotel accommodations and other expenses.

The trip was truly a working mission, Hanway says in his first article with not much time for sight seeing. They left the Washington, D.C., airport Sunday, April 11, at 2 p.m., had dinner Monday in Rome with members of the U.S. Embassy then flew the seven hour journey to Cairo, Egypt. Here they barely had time to bathe and change clothes before the flight continued over the Red Sea across the sand wastes of Saudi Arabia, and finally landed early in the afternoon of April 13 at Karachi, Pakistan, where they were greeted by members of the American Embassy who helped with governmental "red tape" at the airport.

Four and one half days were spent in Karachi visiting various government officials. In 1953, lack of rains and the ensuing drought conditions had resulted in a terrible shortage of wheat in Pakistan, more than one and a half million tons less the usual crop. This was alleviated and more than a million people saved from starvation when the U.S. sent 700,000 tons of grain as a free gift to Pakistan. In these conditions, that the people should be informed as to the source of the wheat, that it should be given free to those who could not buy it; that proceeds from any wheat sold were to remain in the country to be used for agricultural and water development schemes.

Hanway and his party were taken to a military installation where they saw U.S. material, mounted guns, etc., and beyond which was a veritable mountain of the sacked wheat given Pakistan by the U.S.

Hanway's description of Pakistan is very interesting. The country is divided into two parts, East and West Pakistan, separated from each other by 1,100 miles of Indian territory. The mission visited West Pakistan, whose area touches the Himalayan foothills and the Hindu Kush mountains in the north, separated by a thin stretch of mountains from Russia, adjoining Iran and Afghanistan on the west and northwest, India on the east and southeast. East Pakistan, formerly known as East Bengal, lies between West Bengal and Burma. Karachi, the capital city, with a population of 1,118,000, is an important port located on the Arabian Sea, and has more than doubled in population since partition from India in 1947, with the consequent influx of six million displaced persons to the "Promised Land" known as Hindustan before separating from India. The population is 90 per cent Moslems, the remainder being Hindus, Christians, Parsees, Buddhists and other. Thousands of Hindus moved out into India where the Hindu philosophy predominates. In contrast with the many attractive new homes in Karachi, refugees and displaced persons were living in squalid hovels built of sticks and stones, "not very pleasant to view," Hanway stated.

On April 16, the mission left for Bombay, India. Here they saw the Aarey Colony project where 12,000 water buffaloes are hand milked in what is known as the Bombay milk scheme and is, Hanway says, comparable to any U.S. modern dairy project. It is operated by the Indian government although the animals are partly owned by farmers who agree to terms of the scheme. They are paid market prices for milk after feeding costs are deducted. The farmers all live on the premises and have all the care of their buffaloes. The Bombay city government sponsors a milk plan for the schools where small children are given a bottle of milk every school day.

Few children get beyond the fourth grade in India due to poverty of their parents and lack of public school teachers and teacher training facilities.

Four days in Bombay, then on to Delhi for the weekend, visiting the Taj Mahal, one of the seven wonders of the world; then by special arrangements of the embassy, a short visit at Agra, 120 miles east of New Delhi. Hanway says India's food situation is generally critical. The average calorie intake is 1,700 per person compared to that of our 3,000 and more. Under technical assistance the U.S. is trying to increase India's food supply, provide education and health programs, develop more water wells and improve soil with greater use of fertilizer.

After a night trip they arrived at Bangkok, Thailand (formerly Siam). Here the people were very well off and well fed. The average family has 10 acres of land and owns three or four water buffaloes. They are friendly and treat Americans with the utmost courtesy and hospitality.

The curse of Thailand farmers has been the prohibitive interest rates charged, usually paid from rice crops and running from 50 to 100 per cent and even as high as 100 per cent. A move is underway to break this farmers' burden and better conditions should soon prevail. Rice, rubber and teakwood are principal exports of Thailand. Indonesia, the next stop, is the little country which in December, 1949, gained its freedom from the Dutch Netherlands and has made great progress ever since in self government. Included among exports are rubber, petroleum, copra, tea, pepper, palm oil and tobacco; the wheat flour are major agricultural exports.

Meetings with various officials and assistants were held during the mission's stay in Indonesia.

The next leg of their trip was to Singapore, via Sumatra. From there they went to Manila, via Saigon, Indochina, a 12-hour trip. Here they saw rice paddies, pineapples, coconuts and banana trees, much the same as in Indonesia, with lovely mountain and lake scenery. On July 4, 1946, the Philippines got its independence from the United States after a dependency dating back to the Spanish American War. As a republic, it has 51 provinces with a president and a bicameral legislative body. The economy of the Philippines will continue to be dependent on the U.S. for many years to come, Hanway said. Private capital is invested on a large scale and gives employment to thousands of island people. The good neighbor policy is carried out there and a feeling of friendship for the U.S. prevails.

The group viewed the results of World War II in the islands, but much has been accomplished in the way of restoration. Manila is an expensive place to live, according to Hanway, with inflation much on the U.S. scale and over two million unemployed in the islands.

Hanway says, "Whether the Philippines lawmakers will appreciate the importance of playing ball with foreign capital if they expect to attract it to their country is not definite, but recent developments over there indicate they may exclude foreigners from engaging in retail business as a starter. Many Chinese who are now in retail business in the islands will be affected by this latest legislation."

The group was transported by the Navy to Corregidor, "the rock" lying in the entrance to Manila Harbor and once guarding all approach to it. They were escorted by armed Philippine soldiers over rocky roads on the island and saw the ruins of the big sun emplacements which were knocked out by Jap bombers and ruins of the concrete barracks where our troops had been quartered. It was on Corregidor that General MacArthur was picked up on his epic trip to Australia, with Gen. Wainwright left on the island to surrender to the Japs before he and his men died of starvation.

At Manila, Hanway saw Don E. Huth, chief of the Associated Press there, and discussed the seven or eight papers printed in the Islands.

To Hong Kong from Manila was the next part of the trip. Hong Kong is a British Crown colony bordering on Red China, and Sunday was spent seeing things of interest through the courtesy of the U.S. consulate there. The biggest group of the day came when the group got a peek behind the Bamboo Curtain — a look into Red China. Permission was granted to enter an area where an armed British contingent was stationed on a high hill overlooking a broad expanse of country. A river separates Hong Kong territory from Red China and this is supplemented by the party's own entanglements. The party also enjoyed a three hour motor cruise around Hong Kong Island with General Chenault's Civil Air Transport furnishing the boat, a reconverted PT vessel.

The party also visited the fishing village of Aberdeen on the other side of the island, and saw Revere Bay, which is a famous wintering place for the people over there. The British were not much interested in our surpluses but rather were more concerned about prices and how they compared with those of New Zealand and Australia.

The mission left Hong Kong for Tokyo, flying over the island of Okinawa which was captured from the Japanese at such heavy cost of lives, then over Formosa, seat of the Chinese Nationalist government. Japan heads the list of countries the Hanways would like to revisit, he says.

The Japanese people are rehabilitating themselves and reestablishing economy rapidly. The postwar land reform program initiated by General MacArthur has proved very successful and a great blessing to the country, according to Hanway. Japan's natural resources are limited, consisting of a few products such as coal and timber, but the people are so ingenious and resourceful that their manufacturing ranks fifth or sixth in the world today. Despite the fact that the entire country is no larger than the state of California and has a population of 87 million, (one of the most densely populated countries in the world) the land is only 15 per cent arable, farmed by 16 million farm families, who are engaged in one of the most intensive farm programs in the world. The average farm is two and one-half acres and sustains a family of from eight to 10 people and yields from eight to 10 people and yields of rice and other foods rank high in the world. Most of the farm work is done by hand, the families actually live with the crops until they are harvested.

Family life in Japan is described by Hanway in vivid and realistic style. He also tells of visits to a number of shrines at Nikko, located at the foot of high mountains close to a stream in a gorge across from which is the famous "Sacred Bridge" finished in lovely red lacquer. The shrines are comparable to our churches and have deep religious meanings for the thousands who visit them every holiday.

At a luncheon attended by a trade group, Hanway says the Americans were told of some of their shortcomings, including accusations that U.S. shippers (at least some of them) were giving short weights and shipping qualities different to those represented. Notes were made of these grievances and will be incorporated in recommendations of the Asian mission to the secretary of agriculture, to whom members of the mission will report their findings in the various countries visited on the two months' tour.

On May 24 the party broke up in Tokyo, the mission accomplished and the Hanways left for America.

After two hours spent at Wake Island, (of dramatic history of the early days of World War II, the trio went to Honolulu, thence to San Francisco. They were grateful to be back safe and sound in the USA after seven weeks and 25,000 miles of air travel around the world. Hanway says it is stimulating and educational to learn that the Asian countries have problems like ours, and we, like theirs; in other words, it is one world.

He concludes his series of articles with the words of Samuel Johnson: "The use of traveling is to regulate imagination by reality, and instead of thinking how things may be, to see them as they are."

GOP Strategy In N. Y. Eyed

NEW YORK (AP)—U.S. Sen. Irving M. Ives, Republican candidate for governor, planned to unveil a strategy-shouldered announcement today amid speculation that he would try to set a bombshell into the state election campaign.

Ives last night suddenly and without explanation canceled his speaking schedule for today and came here from Albany.

His press secretary, William Tyler, told newsmen in Albany that an announcement would be made today at Republican state headquarters in the Hotel Roosevelt here. GOP spokesmen would give no hint of what was in store.

Asked what the nature of his statement would be, Ives said, "We'll know more about that later. Ives, who had been on a speaking tour upstate, said the GOP campaign there "looks good."

In a speech at Albany last night, he took note of straw polls that have indicated Averell Harriman, the Democratic-Liberal nominee for governor, was out in front in the election race. He said: "I never fight so hard as when my back is to the wall."

He added, "We're coming through—polls or no polls—with a sweeping victory."

Quadruplets Born In Canada

BATHURST, N. B. (AP)—Quadruplets—three girls and a boy—were born in Hotel Dieu Hospital here last night to Mrs. Lawrence Doucet, 24, of Bathurst. Mother and children were reported well.

Hospital authorities said the babies were about two months premature. They were placed in incubators without any weights being taken.

The father, 35, is a truck driver. His only other child is a 14-month-old girl.

Homes Destroyed By Korean Fire

PUSAN, Korea (AP)—More than 3,000 persons were made homeless here last night when two fires destroyed 481 homes.

One fire which started in a Korean home leveled 361 homes, making 2,460 persons homeless.

Another fire started from a kerosene lamp in a refugee-crowded sector and destroyed 120 homes. It left 800 Koreans homeless. No casualties were reported. Police estimated the loss at $78,000.
