US Marines Face Battle Over Status

WASHINGTON (AP) - A backstage battle over the future status of the Marine Corps is reported to be boiling in the Pentagon. Informed sources who declined to be quoted by name said the issue is whether the Marines will come under complete command of the chief of naval operations or will remain under the Secretary of the Navy.

An informant said Secretary Charles Thomas now has on his desk an order, with a request that he sign it, which would put the Marines under supervision of the naval operations chief. Thomas is currently in Europe. Official Pentagon spokesman declined immediate comment.

The general interpretation of a law passed a year ago is understood to be that the Marines shall be under the Navy secretary with the Navy's top uniformed officer having only operational control over them. That law set a minimum Marine establishment of three divisions and three Marine air wings. A special study of the organization of the Navy headed by Thomas S. Gates reported in April that the Navy secretary had issued policy directives making it clear that the commandant of the Marine Corps was considered directly under the control of the Navy secretary.

Since then, pro-Marine sources say, an effort has been made to get Thomas to issue an order bringing all aspects of Marine activities under control of the Navy chief of operations, Adm. Robert B. Carney. The reported purpose is to give the Navy chief greater leeway in the use of appropriations. Generally speaking, funds for the Marines are included in the Navy budget.

Parents Plan Fathers' Night

It will be Fathers' Night at the Parents and Patrons November meeting Wednesday night at 7:30 at Pelican Court in the Klamath Union High School, it was announced by Buz Larkin, president. Under the auspices of National Education Week, the fathers will present a program including an all-father live band, singing numbers, square dancing and incidental father-talented entertainment.

The October meeting of Parents and Patrons was one of the largest attendances for visitation of rooms of students, Larkin said, with over 550 mothers and fathers on hand. There will be a short business meeting preceding the entertainment schedule and refreshments will be served later in the cafeteria. Larkin urged all mothers and fathers of KUHS students to make this one of the largest meetings yet.
