Pentagon Reveals Plans On Guided Missiles Spending

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Pentagon plans soon to increase its spending for continental defense and guided missiles.

Secretary of Defense Wilson included those items among several he said would call for heavier outlays in the 33-billion-dollar expenditure budget he foresees for the fiscal year beginning next July 1. Total spending at that level would be about a half-billion less than docketed for the current year.

Wilson gave no details, but expenditures this year for continental defense—interceptor planes, anti-aircraft weapons and radar warning networks in the United States, Alaska and Canada—are expected to be about 600 million dollars. The Pentagon also will seek authority to build a fifth 60,000-ton supercarrier Wilson said in answering questions at a news conference Tuesday. Three of the huge carriers are now under construction and a fourth has been authorized by congress.

In the discussion of supercarriers, reporters asked Wilson's opinion of an address by British Field Marshal Lord Montgomery this week in which he expressed the view that the day of the aircraft carrier is "approaching its end."

The U.S. Navy finally obtained approval to start the supercarrier program only after several years of controversy and over the objection of the Air Force. Obviously with this controversial background in mind, Wilson said of Montgomery's comment:

"He is a very brave and bold man to come into another country and give some advice."

Another query was prompted by an address last week in which Air Secretary Talbot discussed the difficulties of continental defense, including the use of anti-aircraft guided missiles. Talbot did not specifically mention the Army's Nike missile, although in the text of his talk he spoke of a missile used against an oblete propeller-type bomber.

Asked if he thought the Nike had been "oversold," Wilson replied that while on a recent inspection trip in the West he had seen the Nike fired, "and it looked like quite a weapon to me." He said the test was against a drone plane which he thought might have had a speed of 200 or 300 miles per hour.

In answer to another question, Wilson said he believed the number of American military personnel who would be stationed in Canada to man radar stations would be comparatively small—a few hundred. One radar chain now is in full operation in the area of the Canadian-United States border; a second is being built north of the populated area of Canada and in Alaska seven stations are operating in a projected "distant early warning" line across the Arctic rim of the continent.
