Scientists Working On New Milder Antipolio Vaccine

CHICAGO (AP)—Surgeon General Leonard A. Scheele said today that several laboratories are working on the problem of finding a milder but still effective antipolio vaccine. He said the Salk vaccine used in tests last year and given to larger numbers of children this year contains "the Mahoney virus strain, a strain of Type 1 virus that is highly antigenic but is also highly invasive."

A less invasive strain that still could produce sufficient antibodies to combat the polio virus would provide an additional margin of safety, he said.

At present, the polio virus in the Salk vaccine is killed by a powerful chemical. When dead, the virus still is capable of producing antibodies, without causing polio in the patient.

However, any live virus present in inadequately treated vaccine is capable of causing polio.

Writing in the Journal of the American Medical Assn., Scheele said other problems under study for combating polio are:

1. The combination of the Salk vaccine with other disease-fighting agents, just as diphtheria and tetanus toxoids are now administered together.

2. Development of vaccines based on different principles than those employed in the Salk process.

"Although we can expect further research and observation to lead to improvements, the vaccine is, at present, our most useful weapon in the prevention of paralytic poliomyelitis," he said.

Meanwhile, in Philadelphia, three scientists said they had discovered a safer, quicker and cheaper way to produce and test the polio vaccine.

They said that in this new process, polio virus is removed from the medium in which it is grown, producing a concentrate of 99.9 per cent of the virus. They said present methods do not remove most of the extraneous materials used in growing the virus and that manufacturers must work with large quantities of material, making production a complex and expensive project.

The report was issued by Dr. Arthur Greene, Dr. Lewis Cortell and Joseph Smolens, a bacteriologist, all of the staff of Children's Hospital in Philadelphia, in today's issue of Science, the official publication of the American Assn. for the Advancement of Science.
