By Bessy, the Basin Bussy The day of the petticoat may be just beginning again — a second childhood, so to speak.

Some modern American automobile colors—the likes of which have never been trundled before the public so successfully in any other way—have been picked up for "motor wrap" in London.

Another London design series features metallic fabrics—gold and bronze—for wear with mink coats. Not bad combination for the guy in mind to aim for—gold and mink. Huh?

One combination hard to beat is the way man and nature work together in our modern agricultural system. Sure, nature always did alright by herself—but there was no need to do better then.

Nowadays, with human beings thinking about best ways to keep their young healthy and strong—and themselves fit and jiggling—someone had to improve a little on nature's speed of production. They couldn't improve milk itself, but they have found how to get more of it more consistently than ever before.

It takes investment in equipment, in manpower, in concentrates and chemicals and land to get that production. But in the end, it puts that tall glass of sparkling, fresh milk by your plate—and your children's, too—when you want it there. Fresh milk from the local stores with Bessy on their doors. Take it from me—drink three glasses every day. Bessy.
