Ships Search For Barge

KODIAK, Alaska (AP) — Coast Guard and Navy vessels searched the North Pacific Tuesday for the four-man crew of the barge Seahorse on the faint hope the men may have escaped in a lifeboat when the barge sank during a weekend storm.

The Coast Guard said the tug Pawtucket reported the Seahorse sank in Gulf of Alaska 100 miles off Pt. Gore early Sunday while being towed from Kodiak to Cordova. Pt. Gore is at the tip of the Kenai Peninsula.

Searchers found one wrecked lifeboat from the Seahorse but the barge was known to have carried a second motorized lifeboat which had provisions. No trace was found of the second lifeboat.

Rexford Peters of Kodiak was the captain of the barge and Arlo Kee of Seattle was the engineer. The other two crewmen were not identified.

The Seahorse, owned by the Kodiak Alutian Salvage Co., had been doing dredging work at Kodiak. Peters, a captain in the Army Transportation Corps in World War II, was well known in Alaska.

FAULTY WIRING — Smoke coming from faulty wiring resulted in the Suburban Fire Department being called to the residence of RAY L. McLane at 5:42 p.m. Monday. There was no damage. Firemen shut off power to the house until repairs could be made in the wiring.
