Radioactivity Believed Cause Of Sea Convulsions

By RENNIE TAYLOR
 LOS ANGELES (AP)—Is radioactivity causing slow convulsions in the rock formations underlying the oceans? A scientist who specializes in studying the seas believes this may be so.

Two clues picked up by researchers in the last five years point in this direction, Dr. Roger Revelle, director of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography, told the American Physical Society.

Individual samples of rock from under land areas contain more "hot" or radioactive atoms than rocks from beneath the oceans, Dr. Revelle reported, but, astonishingly, the average amount of radioactivity from undersea rocks is a little greater than the average for those from beneath the continents.

This was indicated, the scientist said, by two dozen measurements of heat flow made by Scripps researchers at widely separated points under the Pacific, and dozen similar measurements by British investigators under the Atlantic.

A plausible explanation, he said, may be that the rocks under the waters, even though they contain fewer hot atoms per cubic yard, may produce more total radioactivity because they may extend deeper into the earth. This is the first clue.

The second came from heat measurements in two particular spots in the Pacific, one was in the Great Acaulco Trench, a canyon in the ocean bottom off Central America. The other was 500 miles to the west, where a mountainlike ridge rises from the ocean floor.

The heat in the rock beneath the trench was comparatively low, while that in the ridge area was twice as great as for the under-ocean area as a whole.

Dr. Revelle said this could mean that cold rock masses were moving downward under the trench, and warm rock areas moving upward under the ridge.

The convulsing movement is very slow, possibly at the rate of one mile in a hundred thousand years, the scientist reported.

Mitchum Recommends Film Concerning Narcotic Trade

By ALINE MOSBY
 United Press Hollywood Writer
 HOLLYWOOD (UP)—Should Hollywood producers make movies about narcotics? Robert Mitchum said today he thinks they should.

The film colony currently is torn by a sizzling controversy over Hollywood's first picture on a dope addict, "The Man With The Golden Arm."

The Motion Picture Producers' Assn. (with major studios as members) refused its seal of approval in line with a 25-year-old taboo on the subject of narcotics. Spokesman Eric Johnston said the film "never should have been made."

But major films on narcotics came under the approving scrutiny today of Mitchum, who once served a jail sentence himself on a marijuana charge.

"Why not make such movies?" shrugged the actor. "I can understand Eric Johnston picking on some story about a private detective, but I don't see what's the objection to this film. I don't know of any problem added by concealment and opinion."

But other opinions have been voiced against "The Man With The Golden Arm." Paramount head V. Frank Premeaux stated the MPAA code should be adhered to. One local TV station and two radio stations refused to accept ads for the movie. Daily Variety, a trade paper, editorialized that the film is "an immoral picture."

However, the Legion of Decency, which reviews films for Catholics, did not condemn the picture. It was given a "B" rating, meaning objectionable in part.

On a recent TV program, producer Jerry Wald and director Otto Preminger battled over the picture.

Preminger, who made "The Man With The Golden Arm," argued the narcotics problem can be helped by publicizing the subject because "Young people are curious about a veil of secrecy." Wald charged the movie was "an untrue portrait of an addict's ability to cure himself."

Twentieth Century Fox recently purchased a Broadway play about narcotics "Hatful of Rain." A spokesman says the dope angle will be eliminated from the film. But insiders believe the studio hopes the MPAA production code will be amended by the time the picture is made in 1957.

Corn Rust Said Serious

ATLANTA (AP)—A disease that floods in the air and migrates like birds could wreck America's greatest food crop, scientists warned today.

It is corn rust disease. But fortunately, scientists are finding strains of corn that resist this fungus disease. They think this resistance can be added to present-day hybrid corn in time to thwart disastrous epidemics.

Strangely, some resistant strains come from Mexico and South America, where great civilizations once flourished and perished partly because, perhaps, the rust disease ruined corn crops.

The story of this scientific search was described today to the American Assn. for the Advancement of Science by J. G. Dickson, P. M. Leroux, R. Spangnanda and A. L. Flanagan, plant pathologists of the University of Wisconsin.

If a new type of corn disease, apparently, or a new strain of the rust enemy appears, it "can move from field to field across the corn belt, resulting in millions of dollars in damage."

A corn rust disease has started spreading in the past few years from Mexico. Its spores or tiny seeds float in the air. Spring winds can carry the spores north, like birds, to attack young corn plants. Cold autumn winds can float them south, moving them as well as giving tail winds to ducks and geese heading south for the winter.

New hybrids are being studied and tested for disease resistance, but it will be several years before commercial amounts of seed are available.

A NEW WALKING CHAIR was presented to Evelyn Overstreet, 12-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Overstreet, 2020 Fargo Avenue, by the Klamath Falls chapter of Beta Sigma Phi sorority. Evelyn, a victim of cerebral palsy, will be able to move around her home much better with the aid of the new chair, given to her as a Christmas present. Paula Fletcher, president of the group, presented the chair to Evelyn on behalf of the chapter. The sorority president extended the best wishes of the group to Evelyn with the hope that she may one day be able to walk.

Bible Price Tag Queried

WASHINGTON (AP)—An organization raising funds for the purchase of an ancient Bible text, known as the Yonah Codex, says questioning of the 1-million-dollar price tag put on the manuscript comes from "disgruntled persons."

The organization, the Aramaic Bible Foundation, said this yesterday in commenting on a resolution of the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis that questioned the age and importance of the New Testament manuscript.

Experts of the biblical literature society—composed of Protestant, Catholic and Jewish scholars—had said at the group's annual meeting in New York that a "fair estimate of the value of a manuscript like the Yonah Codex is about $5,000."

The manuscript is now being exhibited around the nation as part of the Bible foundation's drive to raise funds for its purchase from a private owner. The foundation said the codex is owned by Norman M. Yonah, whose family brought it to this country from Assyria.

In a statement, the foundation said of the biblical literature society's action:

"The resolution purporting to come from 1,200-odd members is obviously the work of a limited number of disgruntled persons undertaking to thwart the work of the Aramaic Bible Foundation.

"Their true interest is not in that of the public as claimed but in the possible threat to their theological hierarchy which is botomed on Greek and not Aramaic."
