Home Design Study Asked

NEW YORK (AP)—American housewives of middle income families were asked Thursday to help the federal government in establishing improved design standards of typical homes that will keep pace with the rapidly changing mode of contemporary living. Albert M. Cole, administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency, said during an interview that this agency wants the housewives to send letters to the HHFA expressing their views and wants on new modern homes that will "work for them" and keep pace with the development of technological improvements designed to make the homemaker's job easier. He announced that his agency plans to call a "Congress of American Housewives" in Washington probably by the end of April to meet with his agency, other government agency representatives and private industry experts to discuss the future course of home design. "The American home building industry is in transition," he said. "Gone are days when acute need for more shelter was the chief factor in the purchase of a house. Gradually we have entered an era of highly selective buying—an era in which the buyer will speak with ever-increasing vigor and effect about what his family wants and expects to find in a new home." "Home builders, manufacturers, realtors, lenders and the government can not go forward on the basis of well-meaning opinions and untested theories," Cole said. "They need hard facts." A women's Congress on housing may help provide these facts, he said.
