AA Groups Meet Here

Many youthful compulsive drinkers are turning to Alcoholics Anonymous for help, a leader of the organization said here Sunday.

AA delegations from all parts of Oregon met in Klamath Falls to formulate plans to expand their program for aiding persons who are afflicted with the disease of alcoholism.

Doc D. of Portland, secretary of the Oregon group, credited widespread publicity given the movement for attracting younger alcoholics to the program.

"Fifteen years ago," he explained, "the majority of AA members ranged between 45 and 60 years old. In recent years that has changed. It used to be generally believed that a compulsive drinker wouldn't do much about his drinking problem until he lost his job and family and landed on skid road."

"Now we have quite a few members who are in their early 20's and a great many more still in their 30's," he continued. "These young people realize they are problem drinkers and decided to do something about it before they hit bottom."

AA delegations from Portland, The Dalles, Woodburn, Astoria, Eugene, Medford, Grants Pass and North Bend attended the two-day conference which ended Sunday.

Farmer City Was Quite A Place In The 1860's

By HARMAN W. NICHOLS
United Press Staff Correspondent

WASHINGTON (UP) — I have learned, at a late date, that in 1860 it was against the law in Farmer City, Ill., to fly a kite or scare a team of horses in the "business district."

Penalty for flying the kites ran from $1 to $25 fines. The fine was the same for exciting a team of spanking bays. There was some relation between kites and batting a bay on the rump. Horses, back there 66 years ago in my home town, were equally allergic to a loose kite and an unexpected anything that was beyond the view of the blinders.

All of these regulations are contained in an old book I found on my last trip home. It is called "The Municipal Code Of Farmer City," and most likely is the last copy extant, yellowed with the test of time.
