Electronics Expanded At Ore Tech

Electronics technology started its 11th year at Oregon Technical Institute with the largest enrollment in the history of the school, according to Don B. Orrell, department head.

More than 85 new students registering for the course has necessitated making five sections for first termers and the fourth term has been divided into two sections. Approximately 55 students returned for their second year, bringing to more than 140 the total enrollment in the two-year course.

The curriculum has been expanded this year to include more mathematics and other sciences requested by prospective employers of the graduates. Last year's graduating class of 23 had numerous choices of employment and those who decided against going into business for themselves, the IBM, telephone companies, the radiation laboratory at Livermore, Sandia Corporation or other concerns engaged in electronics research and manufacturing.

Maurice Houser returned to the teaching staff of the course this year after working one year in private industry. He replaces Norman Jacobson who left the school to join Sandia Corporation at Livermore, California, in atomic research. Bill Grimes, formerly of KFLW, is a new member of the staff and the Rev. M. A. McKinney, pastor of the local Congregational Church, is a part time instructor in radio speech. There are seven full time instructors this year in addition to the part time instruction, an increase of one over last year.

The course, which is aimed at fitting graduates for work in almost any branch of the electronics field, has been growing in popularity as the field of electronics has forged ahead both commercially and in the field of research. The course has no known duplicate in any school west of Chicago.

Word has been received that the Engineers Council for Professional Development, which is national in scope, will make an inspection in the near future for purposes of accreditation.

Youthful Driver Flunks In Quiz

A 17-year-old Klamath Falls driver was perfectly capable of explaining why his car was cutting corners short and swerving down Klamath Avenue late Friday night but he couldn't explain to police why the car was chasing a car load of girls at the same time.

Police noted the car fly around a corner and swerve down the street after making a turn at Fifth Street. They also noted a car full of girls directly in front of the youth's machine. The 17-year-old was arrested and charged with reckless driving.

The youth readily explained that his throttle had stuck and that he had had similar trouble with it before. When asked why he was chasing the girls the boy replied, "I dunno."

He is scheduled to appear in the juvenile court on Monday.
