

Rural Area Population Up

WASHINGTON — The Agriculture Department says the farm population is declining but the rural population is increasing.

It estimates the farm population at about 20,396,000, or nearly two million fewer than a year ago. But it puts the rural population at 60,677,000 compared with 57,985,000 a year ago.

By farm people it means persons who live on farms and engage in farming. But the rural population includes rural residents, whether they live on farms or not. It includes persons living in small towns and communities of fewer than 2,500 persons.

The department says most of the rural population is interested in buying many things that farmers buy.

"Even though they are not all farming, many of them buy small tractors, fertilizers, pesticides, seeds and nursery stock," the agency reports.
