They Recorded America

Evenings at home with the scriptures was an old family custom.

Patriotic themes, like the capture of spy Andre, were popular.

But Currier & Ives liked to show the tranquility of American life.

by K. C. Jerome

SOME PEOPLE call them corny and maudlin; others praise their honesty and humanity. Whichever side you take, the prints produced by the famous firm of Currier & Ives live as colorful reminders of an America that is gone forever. This year marks both the 100th anniversary of the founding of the firm and the 50th anniversary of its dissolution. During its half-century in business, Currier & Ives lithographed 7,000 subjects, some prints selling for just a few pennies. They were displayed in barber shops and hotels, in dingy tenements and sumptuous drawing rooms. Wherever they hung, Currier & Ives prints held up a mirror to life in the latter half of the 19th century. Few things failed to be portrayed—nay, glorified—by Nathaniel Currier and James M. Ives. There were military prints and political ones, religious and sporting, agricultural and amorous. Most of the subjects were undiluted Americana, but to remind new citizens of the "old country," there were scenes such as the Lakes of Killarney. Perhaps one of these lithographs lies hidden in your basement or attic. A prominent Currier & Ives collector, the late Harry T. Peters, unexpectedly discovered a copy of "Home to Thanksgiving" in a Newburgh, N. Y., harness shop. This is perhaps the most widely known Currier & Ives print in this country today. "The prints produced by this partnership have great historical, romantic, and sentimental values for our time," Peters declared. "They pass on the romance of America to future generations."
