

Typhoon Hampers Voting In Philippine Election

MANILA (AP)—The Philippines moved well past the halfway mark in its presidential election today with no reports of voting day violence. Typhoon Kit held ballooning down on strategic Luzon Island, increasing expectations that President Carlos P. Garcia would win a full term handily.

The typhoon battered 10 provinces in central and northern Luzon Island, causing floods and heavy property damage. Voting was slow getting under way there.

With 15 persons killed during the campaign, the police constabulary was out in force and the army was alerted. There were no reports of serious incidents.

The bad weather over Luzon, where more than half the nation's 7,200,000 voters live, was a blow to Garcia's leading opponents, Jose Yulo of the Liberal party and Manuel P. Manahan of the Progressives. They had banked strongly on central and northern Luzon in their victory predictions.

Two other candidates, Sen. Claro M. Recto and Antonio Quirino, were considered far out of the running.

The election commission predicted more than a million voters would stay home because of the weather.
