Case of the Wayward Radio

by William T. Brannon
 Art by Ed Augustiny

To boost the morale of his employees, Elmer Nellis, owner of a coal and material company, looked about for something to relieve the monotony of work in his Evanston, Ill., office. He rejected television—it would be too much of a distraction—and settled on an expensive radio.

The radio was installed on a shelf in the office and was tuned to a local FM station that offered continuous music with no commercials. It was an instant hit, not only with the office help but with the outside workers in the coal yard. Its soothing strains seemed to lessen the burden of loading coal into delivery trucks.

As Nellis came to work one July morning, typewriters were clicking in the office and the sound of scraping shovels could be heard outside. But amid the activity, there was a strange silence: something was lacking.

"The radio!" Nellis exclaimed. "It's gone." He questioned the office employees, but none of them knew what had become of it; they thought maybe the boss had taken it home with him.

Nellis telephoned Evanston police headquarters, and Detective Sigmund Wroblewski came to investigate. "What about your employees?" he asked. "Are they all here at work today?"

"I don't know, but we can find out." A quick check was made and every employee was accounted for. Detective Wroblewski questioned the office staff. At first they were reluctant to talk, but finally several told of one man, Norwood Hadley, 18, a worker in the coal yard, who had an absorbing interest in the music. He had found numerous excuses to come into the office, and he seemed fascinated by the radio.

Hadley denied knowing anything about the disappearance of the radio. "Let's have a look at your house," the detective said, unconvinced.

The radio was found in Hadley's home, and he was charged with larceny. In court, he said he was sorry and promised not to do it again. He was released on probation, the radio was restored to its accustomed shelf, and another man was hired to take Hadley's place.

The incident was forgotten until a frosty morning the following February when the radio vanished again. Detective Wroblewski didn't bother to stop at the company office but went straight to Hadley's home. Even before he entered, he could hear the silvery strains of FM music. It came from Nellis' radio.

Hadley was taken to court again, but this time the judge was in no mood for promises. He ordered Hadley sent to a reformatory and the radio returned to the coal company.

Time passed and the radio provided pleasant background music for the Nellis employees. Then one day in January, it disappeared for the third time. Detective Wroblewski was notified. "Hadley must be out," he said.

He found Hadley at home, but the house was silent and the wandering radio was nowhere in sight.

"Where is it?" Wroblewski demanded.

"Where's what?" Hadley countered with a show of innocence.

"The radio. Where did you hide it?"

"I don't know what you're talking about. Why accuse me?"

"Let's see the bottom of your feet," Wroblewski said impatiently.

Hadley reluctantly displayed the sole of one shoe, then the other. Both were coated with dark particles, unmistakable signs of a recent visit to a coal yard.

"Want to get it?" Wroblewski asked. "Or would you rather have me find it in my own way?"

"You win," Hadley said. He reached
