... WE SAT around the fire. Outside was the cold sound of the waves breaking. The traveler lit another cigarette and leaned back in his chair.

"Have you ever been fishing when the tides change? It's a strange thing."

He took a deep drag on the cigarette.

"There's only one other experience like it for me and that's dawn in Mexico City. Same thing. Don't ask me why."

He was a little self-conscious.

"When the tide changes, there's a calm. The world is still. The water is smooth and the breeze dies. Then, all at once, a wind comes from nowhere and the water moves again."

"When I was in Mexico City, I used to get up about 5 o'clock in the morning and walk across the plaza to the cathedral. There was a calm then, too. Nothing stirred. Then, as if it was a signal, the men asleep in doorways began to sit up and stretch and I'd hear traffic start and the sounds of voices."

"That's what I think of when I'm fishing."

The traveler rubbed a brown hand across his chin and stared at the fire. I watched his eyes and tried to see the memory in them and make it alive for myself.

It was so odd a parallel, the city and the sea. It wasn't until long afterward that I understood. The stillness of the tide's change is the stillness of man and of the things he cannot control. It is the waiting, the curious interim in which there is no going forth and no coming back.

I have felt the quiet. I have known the hush between what has been and what is to come. It's no good forcing it. It is the time for contemplation, not constriction.

And suddenly then there is the new life, the fresh breeze, the awakened city of the spirit when the past dies and the future is born.

To each of us, traveler or fisherman, mother or child, comes the hush and the sleep, the lull between yesterdays and tomorrows.

And those are the tides of men.
