

Need For Planning Future Recreation Areas Outlined

By FRED DANZIG
NEW YORK (UP)—We can't plan for future leisure at a leisurely pace.

As our population soars — it's expected to hit 225,000,000 in 1975 — the need for more public recreation space climbs with it. And since more than half of our 1975 population will be living near the big cities, in so-called metropolitan areas, we're in for more crowding.

"The lesson for recreationists in this connection is simple — Get the land now!" says James C. Charlesworth, president of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences. "The longer acquisition is postponed, the more expensive it will be," he adds. "How much land is needed? Recreationists say the ideal is to have 20 acres for the spare-time use of each 1,000 population."

At present, 1,807 communities have parks and other recreation areas for their residents, totalling 750,000 acres. Some 1,950 communities also have neighborhood playgrounds and recreation centers.

We have indoor recreation centers — for arts and crafts, ping pong, dancing, etc. — in about 14,000 buildings and one-third of our 14,000 school buildings also are used for public recreation. Our communities now spend more than 500 million dollars for parks and recreation programs.

Other major sources of recreation activity are the 39,000,000 state-owned land and water areas. Attendance at more than 2,000 state parks has passed the 180,000,000-year mark. Then we have forest lands, game refuges and lakes controlled by the United States government, which attract 200,000,000 people a year for hiking, fishing, picnicking, hunting, camping and boating.

Charlesworth, writing in "The Annals of the American Academy," urges that recreation leaders — not city planners — carry out recreation planning. City planners, he feels, are "architects rather than social scientists."

FLUNKED

OCEANSIDE, Calif. (UP)—A housewife, attempting to pass a driver's license test, was told to try again. The reason: A state driver examiner, who accompanied the woman during the test, said her auto sideswiped a parked car and then collided with another auto head-on.
