Life in a Lighthouse

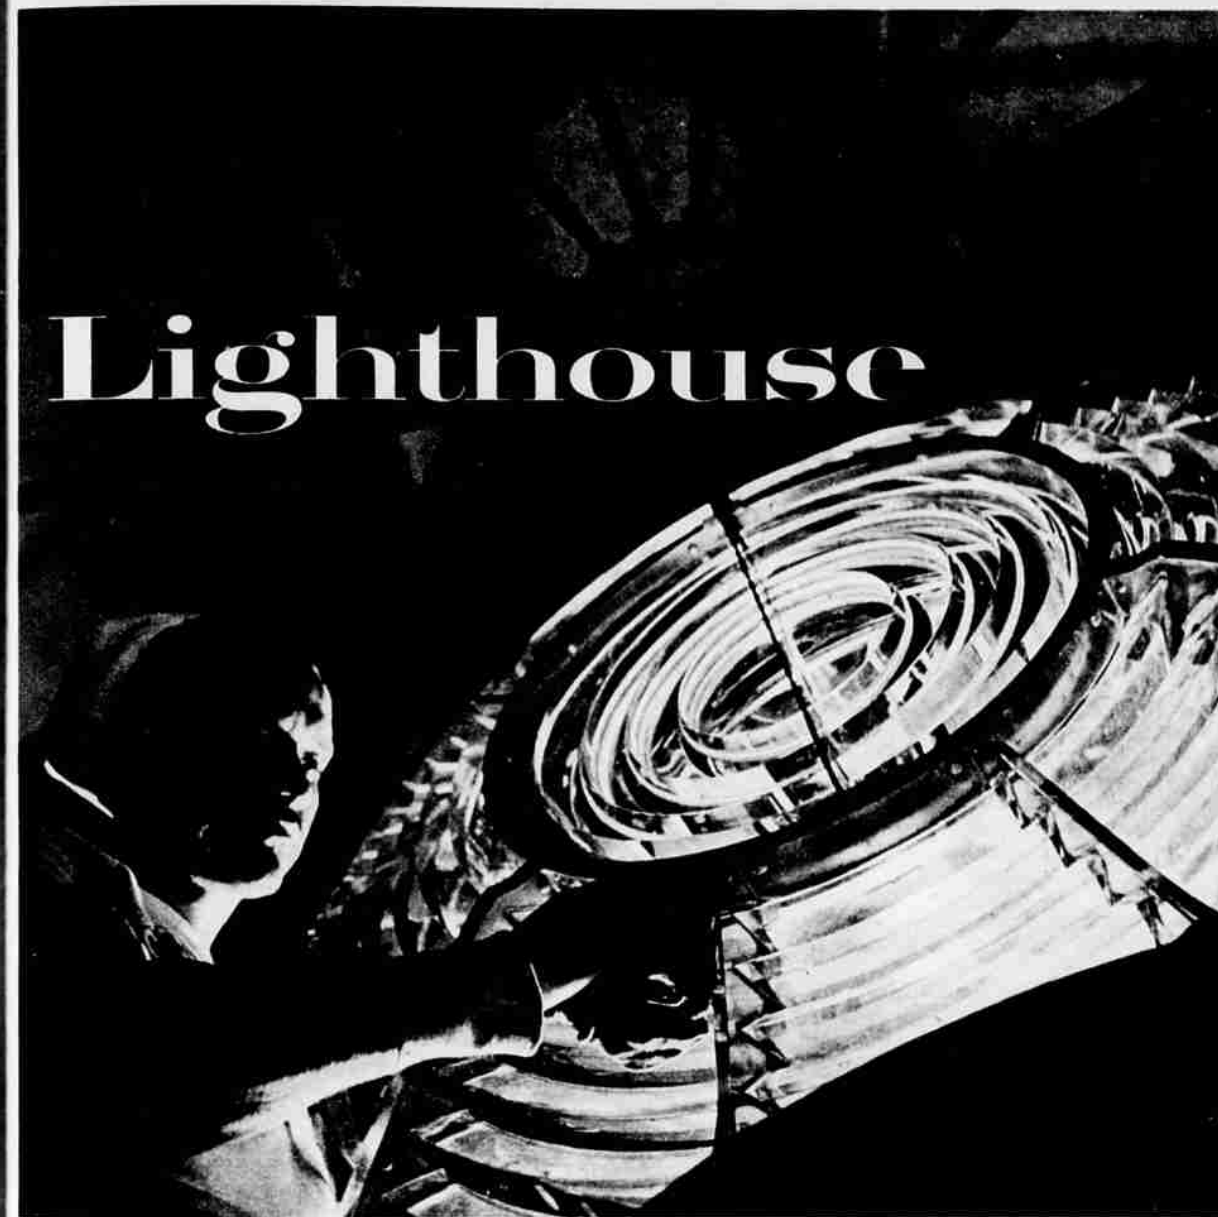

Three-Lions Photos

LOVELY AS A LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER. That's a phrase we can discard as obsolete. Lighthouse keeping has become an involved technical job that requires the services of many experts. Some even bring along their families on their long vigils. Shown here, for example, is Montauk Point Lighthouse on the easternmost tip of Long Island where nearly a dozen technicians—including two with families—find their vital work lightened by friendship and neighborliness.

Guardman winds windless that makes light revolve.

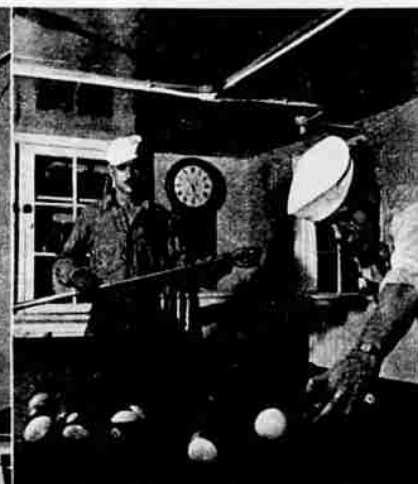

The two-way radio sends bearings 24 hours a day.

Most important job in the Montauk Point Lighthouse is the care and maintenance of the powerful beacon with its 1,000-watt lamp.

Out here a sailor does his own laundry, just as he would if he were aboard ship.

The men have a chance to play or read to relieve the monotony of hours off watch.

One of the routine night duties is calling the next four-hour watch.

The chief's daughter is secured for the night when the beacon goes on.

During the day she has fun with Daddy, Chief Archie Jones, in his free time.
