Kinkajou: A Kute Kleptomaniac

THE KINKAJOU is a mixed-up animal. Related to the raccoon, this resident of the Amazon jungle has the body of a cat, the face of a bear, the eyes of an owl, the hands of a man, and the tail of a monkey. It's also a kleptomaniac. When captured (a little sugar-coated candy and a noose can do it), it doesn't lose any of its old habits—like sleeping during the day—but at night it picks up a few new ones—like stealing. In its nocturnal prowling it makes off with keys, watches, combs, wallets, and other items that every young kinkajou should own. Easily tamed and easily trained, this lovable little animal is also adept at stealing something else—the affections of its owners.

Mischievous attitude as pet is typified by playful peek and protruding tongue. Kinkajou is odorless and easily housebroken.

After midnight, however, its baser instincts come to fore. Here "Slinky" Kinky makes off with master's comb, then heads for lair under covers.

But even a thief must pause to feed the inner man. Kinky slips its long nose into tall glass and, while balancing on tail, drinks its fill.
